

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

C. R., V. IV.

CENTRAL REPORTER.

(Each case shows its date of decision.)

PENNSYLVANIA.

SUPREME COURT.

McDEVITT'S APPEAL.

A devise to a son, of a share to be retained by a trustee for and during the son's natural life, and the interest thereof to be paid to the son yearly, and after his death his share to be equally divided among his children, if he should have any, or to their issue, creates only a life estate in the son.

APPPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Lancaster County, dismissing exceptions to an auditor's report. Reversed.

The facts as found by the auditor are as follows:

Richard Derrick died May 30, 1863, testate. By his will, dated April 22, 1863, he directed: 1, the payment of a pecuniary legacy in equal shares to the children of his first wife, the issue of such as might be dead when the legacy should take effect to receive their parent's share; 2, that certain real estate should be sold and the proceeds equally divided among all his children, as well those by his first as those by his second wife, with a like provision as to issue taking their parent's share as in the first clause; 3, that his widow should have a life estate in other real estate and, after her death, that all his property, real and personal, should be sold and distributed as in the next preceding clause; 4, all the rest, residue and remainder of his estate, of whatever kind, the testator gave to his children, as well by the first as by the second wife, to be equally divided among them, with a like provision as to issue taking their parent's share as in the first clause.

The next clause of the will provided:

"All the share of my property which my son, Eli T. Derrick, is or will be entitled to under the foregoing provisions of this will, I direct to be retained by my son, George W. Derrick, as trustee for the said Eli, during the natural life of said Eli; and I direct the interest thereof to be annually paid to Eli, and after his death his share to be equally divided among his children, if he should have any, or to their issue; the issue in all cases taking the share which their parent would have taken."

The trustee named in the will died and a new trustee was appointed. Eli T. Derrick died on July 31, 1884, leaving neither widow nor issue. The account of the new trustee was filed and an auditor (Alfred C. Bruner, Esq.) appointed to distribute the balance appearing by his account. The auditor held that the legacy was intended as an absolute gift to Eli and his heirs, and further reported:

"The provisions made for the payment of the principal to his children or their issue, after the death of the said Eli, in our mind, confirms this view. Further, there is no special bequest over on the death of the said Eli; the evident intention of the will being to provide for the said Eli during life, and for his issue after his death.

The fact that this special clause is preceded in the will by a general residuary clause does not in our opinion militate against our position. See Willard's Est. 68 Pa. St. 327.

Even should a doubt exist as to the absolute character of this bequest, we must give the legatee the benefit of such doubt. As was said in Smith's App. 11 Harris, 9: 'In cases of doubtful construction the law leans in favor of an absolute rather than a defeasible estate.'

The construction placed by the supreme court in Sprout's App. 13 W. N. C. 168, shows clearly that, wherever possible, distribution shall be made to conform to the general rules of inheritance."

The auditor awarded the fund to the administrator of Eli T. Derrick. Exceptions to this report by the appellant, one of the heirs of Richard Derrick, were dismissed by the court and the auditor's report confirmed. This appeal was then taken.

Messrs. William B. Given and Eugene G. Smith, for appellant:

This legacy was never vested in Eli T. Derrick. It is evident from the will that the testator never intended that it should so vest. The enjoyment of it by Eli is restricted to the term of his natural life and there is a bequest over. A bequest of income will not carry an absolute estate in the principal where the plain intent of the testator is otherwise; and in arriving at that intent, the words of the will must be permitted to have their proper force.

Bentley v. Kauffman, 86 Pa. St. 99.

The intention of the testator is unmistakable.

There is no direction or power given to anyone to pay over the principal or corpus of this fund or any part of it, to Eli T. Derrick at any time or upon the happening of any contingency. The fund was placed, by the very terms of the bequest, in the hands of a trustee "during the life of Eli," with direction that "the interest thereof to be annually paid to Eli," and with the provision immediately following that "after his (Eli's) death his share to be equally divided among his children, if he shall have any, or to their issue."

Thus the testator clearly distinguished, by apt expression, between the limited use given to his son, Eli T. Derrick, and the entirety which was to go to the children of Eli, or their issue.

It was a gift only of the income of the fund with a limitation as to time; and, therefore, the corpus of the fund never vested in Eli T. Derrick.

Millard's Appeal, 87 Pa. St. 457.

Eli T. Derrick had nothing in this fund that was the subject of gift, sale or attachment.

The estate was vested in the trustee to support the contingent remainder, charged with the burden of paying income to Eli T. Derrick, during his lifetime.

Huber's App. 80 Pa. St. 348.

The trust for Eli was an active one; Earp's App. 75 Pa. St. 123; Ash's App. 2 W. N. C. 360; consequently the legal estate for life was in the trustee, to perform the duties imposed by the donor, and could not therefore coalesce with any subsequent estate.

Dodson v. Ball, 60 Pa. St. 492.

The construction of testamentary words must always depend in some measure upon the special facts.

Huber's App. 80 Pa. St. 348.

(No brief was submitted by the appellee.)

Mr Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 9 of the Act of April 8, 1833, declares: "All devises of real estate shall pass the whole estate of the testator in the premises devised, although there be no words of inheritance or of perpetuity, unless it appear by a devise over or by words of limitation or otherwise, in the will, that the testator intended to devise a less estate."

The present contention is as to whether Eli T. Derrick took a fee in the real estate of his father Richard Derrick, under the will of the latter. The clause under which it is claimed Eli took a fee contains no words of inheritance. It is, therefore, by implication only that it can be claimed he took a fee. France's Estate, 75 Pa. St. 220.

In arriving at the intent of the testator we must seek to give effect to every part of the will and to give harmony to the whole instrument.

Turning, then, to the language of the testator, he declares all the share of his property which his son Eli will be entitled to under the provisions of the will shall "be retained by my son George as trustee for said Eli during the natural life of the said Eli;" and "I direct that the interest thereof be annually paid to Eli; and after his death, his share to be equally divided among his children, if he should have any, or to their issue; the issue in all cases taking the share which their parent would have taken."

Eli died intestate, unmarried, and without leaving children or any descendants. The court decreed the fund to the administrator of Eli. In this we think it erred. The legacy was not vested in Eli. A trust was created and George was made the trustee of the whole fund. The corpus thereof was never to be paid to Eli nor to any person to be designated by him. His whole right under the devise was limited to the receipt of the interest thereon. This he was to receive from the hand of the trustee. It, therefore, clearly appears that the testator, by words of limitation in the will, intended to devise to Eli an estate less than one of inheritance.

Decree reversed at the costs of the appellee, and record remanded, with instructions to make distribution to the heirs and devisees of Richard Derrick, entitled to the fund.

Jacob STOKES, Pf. in Err.,

v.

Annie M. MILLER, by her Next Friend.

1. Words, spoken of a single woman, impliedly charging her with degradation of character, and which justify a jury in finding that the intent was to impute to her an act of fornication, are clearly actionable.
2. Evidence as to the common understanding of the words used was held to be irrelevant.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action on the case for slander. Affirmed.

The declaration alleged, inter alia, that "the said defendant * * * did speak and utter the following false, scandalous and defamatory words, to wit:

" 'Annie Miller had got crab lice on her, and to destroy them she used turpentine and it ran into her private parts and made her scream at a great rate and waken up the whole family. And I cast it up to her father and he did not deny it.' 'It's true, she had crab lice and must have got them from her lover.' Thereby meaning and intending, the said Annie M. Miller had been guilty of fornication, obscenity, impurity and gross filthiness of person. * * *

"And the said plaintiff further says that by reason of the said false, scandalous and defamatory words, she has suffered special injury in her good name, fame and reputation."

The plaintiff proved the speaking of the words as laid, but did not offer to prove that they were understood as charged in the innuendo.

The proof of special damages was confined to loss of sleep, injury to health, pain and suffering, bodily and mental, loss of happiness and peace of mind and capacity to do her usual household work.

The court disallowed defendant's offer to prove by physicians that having "crab lice" by an unmarried person does not indicate or prove "that such unmarried person had been guilty of fornication, obscenity, impurity and gross filthiness of person," and such is not the common or proper understanding on the subject. [Fifth assignment of error].

Defendant's first point was as follows:

"1. As Annie M. Miller, the plaintiff in this case is a private person, the words laid in the first count in the declaration are not actionable, because they do not contain an imputation against the plaintiff of an indictable offense of an infamous character, and subject to an infamous and disgraceful punishment; therefore the verdict of the jury should be in favor of the defendant on said first count in the declaration."

Answer:

"If the jury, from the evidence, believe and find that defendant uttered and published the words laid in the narr. and that, in uttering the words so laid in the narr., he intended to charge and cause it to be believed that Miss Miller had been guilty of the crime of fornication, a crime which would put her in peril of loss of social standing and companionship, and being indictable, and attaching to her impurity, depravity and moral turpitude, then the words are actionable, and the plaintiff would be entitled to your verdict for at least nominal damages, without proving any malice, or special damage, for both malice and damage or injury would then be implied. If the jury find that the words as charged do not charge or were not intended to charge or impute that Miss Miller had been guilty of fornication, then she is not entitled to a verdict, unless she has satisfied you that the words were uttered maliciously and that she has suffered special injury and damage."

The plaintiff excepted to this answer and made it the sixth assignment of error.

Verdict for the plaintiff for $1, the defendant to pay the costs. The defendant took this writ, assigning, inter alia, the above as errors.

Mr. J. W. Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

No action could have been maintained if there had been a direct charge of fornication.

Goeling v. Morgan, 32 Pa. St. 273, and a long line of cases leading to it; Colbert v. Caldwell, 3 Grant, 186; Stitzell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. St. 56.

The words in the narr. do not charge fornication. There is no evidence that anyone so understood them. We offered to prove that such is not the common understanding. "Unless the words, therefore, without torturing them, imply a charge of felony, neither the innuendo nor the verdict will help them."

McClurg v. Ross, 5 Binney, 220.

Mr. W. A. Wilson, for defendant in error:

Words are actionable "whenever they impute an offense of moral turpitude, punishable in the temporal courts."

Klumph v. Dunn, 86 Pa. St. 146; Shaffer v. Kintzer, 1 Binney, 537; McClurg v. Ross, 5 Binney, 218; Andres v. Koppenheaver, 8 Serg. & R. 255; Goeling v. Morgan, 32 Pa. St. 255; Beck v. Stitzell, 21 Pa. St. 523.

The danger of punishment is not a necessary element. Indeed it is declared that words may be actionable, although the offense imputed be barred by the statute, or the punishment already inflicted.

It is expressly decided in Vanderlip v. Roe, 23 Pa. St. 82; Walton v. Singleton, 7 Serg. & R. 449 and Evans v. Tibbins, 2 Grant, 451, that words imputing fornication are actionable.

The same doctrine is also held in other States, in some of which fornication is not even an indictable offense.

Smalley v. Anderson, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 56; Wilson v. Robbins, Wright (Ohio) 40; McBrayer v. Hill, 4 Ired. (N. C.) 136; Rickett v. Stanley, 6 Blackf. 169; Joralemon v. Pomeroy, 2 Zab. 271.

The sense in which words are received by the world is the sense which courts of justice ought to ascribe to them on the trial of actions for slander. Slander imputes an injury; and the injury must arise from the manner in which the slanderous language is understood.

Rue v. Mitchell, 2 Dall. 58 (2 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 286); Call v. Foresman, 5 Watts, 831; Bricker v. Potts, 2 Jones (Pa.), 200; Lukehart v. Byerly, 3 P. F. S. 418; Stitzell v. Reynolds, 9 P. F. S. 489.

The following words have been held actionable: "She is a loose character—a bad character." Vanderlip v. Roe, 23 Pa. St. 82. "You got to bed with Sarah M." Walton v. Singleton, 7 Serg. & R. 449. "Plaintiff and one A. B. were caught together in the packing room." Evans v. Tibbins, 2 Grant, 451.

In none of these cases was there any specific evidence offered to show expressly that the hearers understood the ambiguous words to imply fornication. A court may properly take notice of the import of words in popular parlance.

Call v. Foresman, 5 Watts, 831.

And the jury is the proper tribunal to pass upon the truth of the innuendo.

Dottarier v. Bushey, 16 Pa. St. 208.

If the words are not actionable, the special damages alleged and proven will support the verdict and judgment.

1 Stark. Slander, p. 2; 2 Greenl. Ev. 14th ed. § 414, note; Pa. Canal Co. v. Graham, 68 Pa. St. 290; Scott v. Montgomery, 95 Pa. St. 444; Bradt v. Towseley, 13 Wend. 253; Fuller v. Fenner, 16 Barb. 333.

Words imputing merely a want of chastity are not actionable per se. Special damages must be alleged and proved; but any special damage, however slight, will sustain the action.

Ross v. Fitch, 58 Tex. 148.

Per Curiam :

The words averred in the declaration and proved on the trial are clearly actionable. Spoken of a single woman, they impliedly charge her with degradation of character, and justified the jury in finding that the intent was to impute to her an act of fornication, which is an indictable offense under the laws of this Commonwealth.

Judgment affirmed.

Matthias BUSH, Plff. in Err.,
v.

George D. BENDER.

In the negotiation for the purchase of horses, the vendee paid part of the purchase money. The horses were to be delivered at a subsequent date, when the vendee offered notes drawn by the vendor in part payment, which offer was refused on the ground that the sale was for cash. The vendee got possession and the vendor brought replevin, without returning the hand money. The vendee pleaded non cepit and property. The court refused to instruct that a return of the hand money was necessary to maintain the suit. Verdict for plaintiff, with assessment of damages. Held, that the judgment must be affirmed.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in replevin. Affirmed.

On February 3, 1883, Bush called on Bender and bought three horses for $355. After agreeing upon the price, Bush paid $10 in cash. It was agreed that the horses should be delivered the following Monday at the Black Horse Hotel, in Lancaster. The horses were brought according to agreement and tied in the hotel yard while the parties repaired to the bar room, where Bush, or one Resh, offered in payment $40 in cash and two notes drawn by Bender to Edward A. Ransing, one for $150, dated September 18, 1882, for sixty days; the other for $152.20, dated November 22, 1882, at sixty days. Bender refused to receive the notes in payment and went to the yard for his horses but found that they had been taken away at Bush's instance. Bender then brought replevin the same day without returning the $10 paid him. Bush claimed the property and gave bond to the sheriff. In court he pleaded non ceptit and property. On the trial Bender testified that the sale was for cash on delivery, and that the latter note was a renewal of the first one. Bush testified: "Nothing was said about cash; he, Bender, said one of the horses was a little higher priced than I generally bought; and I asked him if I did not pay him for all I got, and he said I did." Bush also testified that he and Resh were purchasing agents for Ransing, and that the horses in suit were purchased for Ransing, although Bender did not know it.

The court refused to permit E. A. Ransing to answer the question "whether or not Matthias Bush knew that you would pay Bender with his own notes before the day of payment."

Third assignment of error.

The court also refused to admit in evidence the notes given by Bender to Ransing, referred to above. Fourth assignment of error.

The court, Livingston, P. J., charged the jury, inter alia, as follows: "But we do instruct you, that if Bush bought these three horses for $355, said nothing about buying for Ransing, and that he agreed to the price asked of $355 and requested Bender to deliver the three horses at the Black Horse Hotel; and you believe that either Bender or his man brought them there and tied the horses in the back yard and then went into the hotel with Bush to settle for them for the price agreed upon, and that there in the hotel Bush refused to pay for the horses, but looked on while William Resh counted down to Bender $40 and then threw down two notes of Bender's that he had given to one Ransing long before, threw them down to Bender as part of the purchase money, and which Bender refused to accept—if you believe from the evidence that Bush did that or had Resh do it, and that while this thing was going on in the hotel the horses were unloosed from where Bender's man, Fogel, had tied them, and taken away, the court does instruct you that if you believe that testimony, believe that payment was offered in the manner stated, we instruct you that it was fraud—actual fraud in fact upon Mr. Bender by the defendant. Bush cannot consummate the contract for the purchase of the three horses in that manner." Fifth assignment of error.

The court refused to charge the jury as follows:

1. That before the plaintiff, Geo. D. Bender, can rescind the contract made with the defendant, Matthias Bush, for the sale and delivery of the horses in question, he must have first returned or offered to return the $10 paid him as a part of the consideration money, and that before the bringing of this suit. Plaintiff not having done so, the verdict should be for the defendant.

8. If the jury believe that the sale and delivery were obtained by actual fraud, then such sale cannot be rescinded by the plaintiff without having first returned or offered to return the $10 paid him as part of the consideration money. The plaintiff having acknowledged that he made no such return or offer to return, then the verdict should be for the defendant. First and second assignments of error.

Verdict for plaintiff for $397.96 and judgment thereon. The defendant took this writ specifying the assignments of error above stated.

The fact that the value of the property not returned is small should make no difference in the principle.

If there was evidence of fraud it should have been left to the jury. The court here instructed that there was actual fraud.

"Fraud without damage or damage without fraud gives no cause of action." The payment of Bender's own debt was no damage.

1 Benj. Sales, § 429, p. 467, and notes.

Bush was innocent of misrepresentation or artifice, and should have been allowed to show by Ransing that he did not know of the notes at time of purchase. This distinguishes the case from Harnet v. Fisher, 58 Pa. St. 453, and kindred cases.

Nor would the payment of the $10 earnest money have any effect in changing the title of the property.

Pearson v. Chapin, 44 Pa. St. 9, only applies to executed contracts and where the fraud is discovered after the contract is executed. In this suit the contract was merely executory and the fraud discovered before it was executed. Besides, the grievance complained of was corrected on the trial and by the verdict, which specially sets forth "in favor of plaintiff for $355 less $10."

This is in accordance with the principle enunciated in Babcock v. Case, 61 Pa. St. 431: "If equity requires a reconveyance to precede suit, it will be so administered; if it can be protected on the trial, as it may be in almost every possible case, it will be so administered. If there be no equity in the case, but only an assumption of it, it ought to be disregarded."

In Bleakley's App. 66 Pa. St. 187, it is held that one attempting to defraud another by payment cannot ask repayment from him whom he has attempted to defraud.

Harner v. Fisher, 58 Pa. St. 453, is a case very similar in its facts to the one in controversy, and rules this case.

For answer to fourth assignment, we refer to Allen v. Hartfield, 76 Ill. 358, where seller refused to receive his own note in payment of horses, and maintained an action of trover for their value.

Per Curiam:

This was an attempt of the defendant below to get possession of the horses, contrary to the manifest intent and spirit of the contract. He was not entitled to the possession until he paid for them. The ingenious device to which he resorted to compel the application of the notes, which he held against the other party, cannot receive the sanction of law. Having given bond in this action of replevin and retained the horses, on the right being found against him, the further finding was an assessment of damages. In fixing on this amount it was proper for the jury to take into consideration the $10 which he had paid. They are presumed to have done so, and to have returned a verdict for the residue of the damages.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

COUNTY OF YORK.

1. The compensation ordered to be paid to the sheriff, by authority of law, for the board of prisoners in the county jail, is an emolument of his office, within article III, section 13, of the Constitution of 1874. (Apple v. Crawford Co. 105 Pa. St. 300.)

2. An order of court, under the Act of April 10, 1873, fixing the rate of compensation of an incumbent sheriff of boarding prisoners, at one sum for one year and at a less sum for another year, during his term of office, is not in violation of article III, section 13, prohibiting the increasing or diminishing of the salary or emoluments of any public officer after his election or appointment; notwithstanding another order had been made, during the incumbent's term, fixing the compensation for the past services of his predecessor in office.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of York County, to review a judgment in favor of defendant on a case stated. Affirmed.

The case stated contained the following facts:

The plaintiff below was duly elected sheriff of York County on November 6, 1877, and was duly qualified and commissioned, and entered upon the duties of his office on the first Monday in January 1878, and continued in office and in the performance of his duties during the years 1878, 1879 and 1880, the full term for which he was elected.

One of the official duties of his office was to board the prisoners of the County, for which he was entitled to be paid by the County.

On March 2, 1878, in pursuance of the Act of Assembly of April 10, 1873, Michael Stambaugh, the predecessor of the plaintiff in the office of sheriff of the County, presented his petition to the court of quarter sessions of the peace of said County, setting forth, among other things, "that his term of office expired on the first Monday of January, 1878;" "that in accordance with his duties he boarded all and every of the prisoners committed to the jail of said County during his said official term, in accordance with the requirements of the laws with regard to such duty; that he has not had any settlement with the officials of said County for the boarding of said prisoners, whose duty it is to allow and pay him for such boarding; that no rate of compensation has been fixed by the proper tribunal to be allowed to your petitioner for boarding said prisoners in said jail;" and prayed the court to fix the compensation to be paid to your petitioner for the boarding of each prisoner at the jail as aforesaid. Whereupon the said court made the following order, namely: "And, now, to wit: March 2, 1878, we fix the allowance prayed for at thirty-five cents per diem."

On January 8, 1879, the commissioners of York County presented their petition to the said court of quarter sessions of the peace, praying, among other things, "that they are informed and believe that the court of quarter sessions of the peace of York County shall have the power to increase or decrease, from time to time, the compensation of the sheriff of said County for boarding prisoners in the county jail, and fix the sum at any amount which said court may think reasonable and just; and that it shall be the duty of your petitioners as county commissioners of said County, to pay to the sheriff the amount so fixed by said court."

"Your petitioners, that they may know the better how to arrange financial matters to meet the necessary and lawful expenditures in conducting the business of their said office, pray Your said Honors to fix the compensation of the sheriff as aforesaid, at as early a day as possible and convenient for Your Honors, and would respectfully recommend to Your Honors, in view of the great reduction in the price of all kinds of produce, etc., that Your Honors fix the compensation of the present sheriff for boarding prisoners for the year 1878 and 1879 at twenty-five cents per diem for each prisoner."

Whereupon the court made the following order, namely:

"And now, to wit: January 28, 1879, the court fix the compensation of James Peeling, Esq., Sheriff of York County, for boarding prisoners, at thirty-five cents each per diem for the year 1878 and twenty-five cents each per diem for the year 1879 as prayed for."

Upon an account stated by the said plaintiff, he was, on January 6, 1879, paid by the County defendant, thirty-five cents per diem for each and every prisoner boarded by him from the commencement of his term of office to the above date.

In pursuance of the order of court made January 8, 1879, accounts, giving the number of days of each prisoner boarded and the price per day as fixed by the court, were presented by the plaintiff to the defendant; and he received twenty-five cents per diem for each and every prisoner boarded by him for the year 1879; and, in accordance with similar accounts presented by the plaintiff against the County defendant, he received from the County defendant twenty-five cents per diem for each and every prisoner boarded by him for the year ending January 2, 1881, being the end of his term of office.

James Peeling gave a receipt in full for his fees for boarding prisoners up to January 6, 1879, but has not given receipts in full for boarding prisoners during the years 1879 and 1880; and this action was brought to recover the difference between the amount paid and that due at thirty-five cents for each prisoner per diem.

Upon these facts, the court entered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff took this writ assigning for error the action of the court in entering judgment for the defendant.

Mr. Horace Keesey, for plaintiff in error: The Act of April 10, 1878, P. L. 666, gave the judges power to increase or decrease, from time to time, the compensation of the sheriff, and fix such sum as they might think reasonable and just; but does not require the amount to be fixed for each succeeding sheriff.

The order of March 2, 1878, continued in force until it was rescinded or altered; and this cannot be done so as to increase or decrease the amount during the term of office. Article III, section 18, Constitution of 1874.

That the compensation is an emolument is settled by Apple v. Crawford Co. 105 Pa. St. 300.

Messrs. Levi Maish and J. R. Strawbridge, for defendant in error:

The word sheriffs, not sheriff, is used in the Act. It is evident, therefore, that the Legislature intended to embrace the officer and not the office.

If the court failed to fix the compensation before the election or before the officer entered upon his term of office, the compensation was fixed afterwards.

At the time of the plaintiff's election no rate was fixed. How, then, could it be decreased? This distinguishes the case from Apple v. Crawford County, 105 Pa. St. 300.

If the court had, prior to the plaintiff's election, made an order such as was made on January 28, 1879, fixing the sheriff's compensation, no question could successfully have been raised as to its constitutionality, because different amounts were fixed for similar services.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

This contention arises under the Act of April 10, 1878, P. L. 666, modified by section 13, art. III of the Constitution of 1874. The latter declares: "No law shall extend the term of any public officer or increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment."

The compensation ordered, by authority of law, to be paid to the sheriff, for the board of prisoners in the county jail, is an emolument of his office within the section of the Constitution cited. Apple v. Crawford Co. 105 Pa. St. 300.

The difficulty of the plaintiff in successfully invoking the aid of this section to sustain his contention arises from the fact that there was not any fixed compensation for such an emolument applicable to his office, when he entered on the term thereof.

It appears that his predecessor served an entire term without any rate of compensation having been fixed, or having existed, applicable to his term. Two months after the expiration of his term, on his application, for the purpose of enabling him to settle with the County for the boarding of prisoners, the court fixed the compensation to be paid to him for a claim arising during his term.

This order was one of doubtful authority, even between the former sheriff and the County. It was, however, limited in its application to the payment for past services, to one whose term of office had expired. Although made after the term of the plaintiff had commenced, yet it did not apply to him nor to the office of sheriff generally. No compensation had been fixed when the term of his office commenced. The only order applicable to the plaintiff is the one made on January 28, 1879. Although this fixes one per diem for 1878 and another for 1879, yet it is by virtue of an order made at one time, and soon after the plaintiff had entered upon the second year of his term. He took the office subject to the power of the court to fix his compensation for this service. It made but one order designating the sum he should be paid. He cannot accept one part and repudiate the other part. It is of binding force in its entirety.

It follows that the judgment entered on the case stated is correct.

Judgment affirmed.

RE ROAD IN DRUMORE TOWNSHIP.

1. In the absence of the record in road proceedings showing to the contrary, the presumption is that, whenever practicable, the road was laid at a proper grade.

2. Viewers were entertained by a petitioner for a public road. There was no rule of court prohibiting it. The court found that it was done under circumstances evincing no sinister purpose or effort to unduly influence the viewers. It was held that the proceedings would not be set aside.

CERTIORARI to the Quarter Sessions of Lancaster County, to review the action of the court in dismissing exceptions to the report of viewers laying out a public road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court below by Livingston, P. J.:

"On August 17, 1885, a petition was presented and filed, praying this court to appoint viewers to view and vacate part of a public road in Drumore Township, at Mechanics Grove, Lancaster County, and to lay out another road in lieu thereof. On August 20, 1885, viewers were appointed, to whom an order was issued. On November 16, 1885, the report of the viewers was presented to and confirmed in by the court. In this report the viewers state that in pursuance of the order, they met at the time and place designated in the notice annexed, and after being respectively sworn or affirmed to perform the duties of their appointment impartially and according to the best of their judgment, they all viewed the ground, etc., and agreed that part of said road had become useless, etc., and say: 'We do therefore vacate the same, and do lay out in lieu thereof for public use the new road,' and returned the same in accordance with the courses and distances therein given; and the plot or draft thereof, made part of the report, having had respect to the best ground for a road, the shortest distance, and in such manner as to do the least injury to private property, and as agreeably to the desire of the petitioners as may be; that they endeavored to procure releases from all the land owners, etc., but failed to procure releases of damages from C. H. Hilton and Joseph Retzer. To Hilton they awarded no damage, he being benefited, and to Joseph Retzer they awarded thirty dollars, etc.

"The following exceptions were filed, among others:

"1. The report of viewers does not set forth that said road laid out does not at any point or points exceed an elevation of five degrees, or that by moderate filling and bridging the declination of the road may be preserved within that limit at the crossing of ravines and streams, as set forth in the Act of Assembly.

"2. The said viewers were entertained on the day of the view, September 20, 1885, by Jacob M. Swarr, one of the petitioners, at his residence near the road laid out by the viewers.

"The Act of Assembly requires that, in their report, the viewers shall state particularly: 1. Who of them were present at the view; 2. Whether they were severally sworn or affirmed; 3. Whether the road desired be necessary for a public or a private road. They shall also annex and return to the court a plot or draft thereof, stating the courses and distances, and noting briefly the improvements through which it may pass. The law further requires them, whenever practicable, to lay out the said roads at an elevation not exceeding five degrees (except at the crossing of ravines and streams), where by moderate filling and bridging the declination of the road may be preserved within that limit. But the fact that they do not state in their report that they have done so is not sufficient cause for setting aside their report.

"2 Binn. 250; 4 Binn. 174; 13 Serg. & R. 25; 9 Barr. 70; 9 Harris, 220.

"The supreme court has said that the presumption is that the requirements of the statutes have been complied with by the viewers; and therefore it is not necessary specially so to state in the report, unless specially required by the Act regulating the subject.

"If viewers have disregarded the provisions of the law relating to elevation, exceptions may be filed, and the exceptant may show by proof that the elevation of the road laid out exceeds five degrees, and that it was practicable to lay out a road between the points at an elevation not exceeding five degrees.

"Exception 1 does not allege that the viewers have laid out this road at any elevation exceeding five degrees; the only complaint is that the viewers do not set forth the elevation in their report. This, as we have seen, is not a sufficient reason for setting aside the report; the first exception, therefore, is not sustained.

"In Road in Sadsbury Township, in 5 Lanc. Bar, 162 (Mar. 7, 1884), this court held that 'partaking by viewers of a meal, given by a party interested in the road, without other circumstances evincing a sinister purpose, or effort to unduly influence the viewers, is not sufficient to impeach their report and set it aside.' To the same effect was the decision of the supreme court in Road in Plymouth Township, 5 Rawle. 150.

"The evidence presented with reference to the second exception does not show any circumstances evincing a sinister purpose, or any effort to unduly influence the viewers; and therefore under the above decisions said exception is not sustained.

The report stated that "at no place does the road as laid out exceed an elevation of — degrees."

The exceptions were dismissed and the report confirmed. Joseph Retzer, the exceptant, took this writ, assigning for error the action of the court in not sustaining the above exceptions.

Mr. Benj. F. Davis, for appellant:

The viewers undertook to report on the elevation but left it blank. The presumption is they omitted the degrees because they exceeded the legal limit.

The report should have been set aside because of the entertainment of the viewers.

Magnolia Street, 8 Phila. 468.

As another reason it may be urged that in Lancaster County the payment of costs on the part of petitioners for a view depends upon their success. Act of 1867, P. L. 388, § 1.

In Road in Heidlersburgh, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 7, the only interest that appeared was liability for costs.

Road in Plymouth Township, 5 Rawle, 150, and Road in Sadsbury Township, 5 Lanc. Bar, 162, were reviews, and this distinguishes these cases.

Mr. Simon P. Ely, for defendant in error:

It is the practice in Lancaster County to furnish printed returns with blanks. It was in this way that the blank in this case occurred.

The viewers are not required by Act of Assembly to report the elevation of the road, and all the presumptions are in favor of the legality of the proceedings.

Act of June 18, 1836, § 3; Road in Middle-creek Township, 9 Pa. St. 70; Spear's Road, 4 Binn. 174; McCall's Ferry Road, 13 Serg. & R. 25.

On the question of entertainment of viewers, the case is ruled by Road in Plymouth Township, 5 Rawle, 150.

It was suggested in that case that "an abuse might give room for an interference." But the court held in this case that there were no improper motives. The findings of the court will not be reversed on certiorari.

Re Germantown Avenue, 99 Pa. St. 479.

There were rules of court expressly forbidding the entertainment of viewers in Magnolia Street, 8 Phila. 468, and Road in Heidersburgh, 1 Pa. C. R. 7. There is no such rule in Lancaster County and these cases do not apply.

A jury of view acts for the public and not between individuals; and their action is in a great measure merely advisory, subject to the approval or disapproval of the court. It is not, therefore, analogous to the case of a jury appointed to assess damages, where a stricter rule prevails.

Per Curiam:

Both the assignments of error are to questions of fact. On certiorari we cannot look at the depositions. They are no part of the record. We adopt the facts found by the court as correct.

The Act of Assembly specifies what the viewers shall state in their report, but does not mention the elevation of the road as one of those things. In the absence of the record showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that "whenever practicable," the road was laid at a proper grade. In the absence of any rule of court prohibiting the viewers from being entertained and upon the finding of the court that it was done under circumstances evincing no sinister purpose or effort to unduly influence the viewers, the second specification cannot be sustained. When viewers are required to go a considerable distance in the country, a necessity for refreshments may exist that would not in a city.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Equity has jurisdiction to compel an accounting and discovery in aid thereof, and to restrain the manufacture of other than a patented article, in violation of the terms of a written contract.
2. It is no defense to an action to enforce a contract granting a license to manufacture an article, recited in the con- tract as a patented article, to allege that the plaintiff had no right to the patent or to grant the license to others.

3. A contract for the manufacture of a licensed article, providing that in case of default of monthly statements of sales and payments accordingly, the agreement should be null and void and that the license granted should be forfeited, at the option of the licensors, can not be rescinded by the licensees' refusing the statements. The licensees are liable as long as they manufacture during the continuance of the patent.

A PPEAL and certiorari, to review the judgment of the Common Pleas of McKean County, in equity. Affirmed.

The facts appear in the opinion of the court below, on exceptions to the report of the master, by Olmsted, P. J.:

"The plaintiffs and defendants, on October 15, 1878, entered into a contract in which it was recited that the plaintiffs were the owners of certain letters patent for improvements in the construction of drilling jars, or jar fillings, and that the defendant desired to manufacture said jars for sale and use. The contract then provides as follows:

'Now, therefore, the parties of the first part hereby agree to, and do, license the said second parties to manufacture and sell said jars and jar fillings at their place of business in Bradford, McKean County, Pa., as long as they perform the stipulations and agreements herein specified to be performed by said second parties.

"In consideration whereof, the said parties of the second part agree to render to the said first parties, their heirs or assigns, on or before the fifth day of each and every month, a full, true and perfect statement of all jars and jar fillings made during the preceding month, and to whom sold; which statement shall be verified by the affidavit of the parties of the second part or their agent. And the said parties of the second part agree to pay to said first parties, their heirs or assigns, at the time said statement is rendered, the sum of $10 as royalty for each and every jar or jar filling so made during the preceding month.

"The said parties of the second part further agree that in case of any default in making the statement and payments herein provided, then the agreement shall be considered null and void, and the license granted to said second parties shall be forfeited, at the option of the parties of the first part.'

"It appears, from the evidence, and from the report of the master, that the defendants entered upon the manufacture of these jars at their place of business at Bradford, Pa., and continued to manufacture jars up to the 4th day of June, 1885, when the plaintiffs' patent expired by its own limitation.

"The plaintiffs' bill in this case prays for an account under the contract, for discovery in aid of the account, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from manufacturing jars or jar fillings other than those covered by the contract of the 15th of October, A. D. 1878. On the 2d of April, 1881, a preliminary injunction was ordered, restraining the defendants from manufacturing any jars other than those covered by the patent to the plaintiffs in this case. The defendants' answer was then filed; and on the 24th day of November, 1882, the decree of April, 1881, was amended by adding the words: 'And that the defendants' account to plaintiffs as provided for in this bill of complaint, and that the master heretofore appointed in this case, state said account.'

'Subsequently a motion was made by the solicitor for the defendants to amend the decree for an account, and it was amended by the court by adding the words: 'And to so much of the account as accrued after December 14, 1880, the master is also to take and report the testimony, and his opinion thereon, affecting the liability of the defendants to account after the said date.'

'The proceedings in the case are voluminous, but probably no further reference to them is necessary for a proper understanding of the questions raised by the exceptions to the master's report.

'The exceptions filed by the counsel for plaintiffs are numerous; they are forty-nine in number, but they seem to raise but three questions. The first question raised is: when does the liability of the defendants to account under the contract cease? The contract itself is indefinite as to time; it gives the plaintiffs the power, at their option, to terminate it, and declare the license forfeited at any time when the defendants shall make default in making the statements and payments required of them by the contract. The expiration of the patent on the 4th day of June, 1885, of course terminated the license. It is fair to presume that the parties negotiated with full knowledge of the duration of the patent, and that they had that period in view. The plaintiffs, in case of default on the part of defendants, could terminate it at any time; but the permission was evidently intended for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and it did not enable the defendants at their option to terminate the contract by simply refusing to comply with its terms, and neglecting and refusing to make statements and payments as they agreed to do.

'The defendants were licensed to use the plaintiffs' property; they were not bound to make any specified number of jars nor, indeed, to make any jars at all. If the defendants did not avail themselves of the power which they acquired under the license, if they made no jars such as were covered by the plaintiffs' patent, they could not be called upon to account. If they had made an improvident or unwise contract, they had the power of protection from it in their own hands. But they enter upon the manufacture of these jars under this license and account under the contract up to such period as they might themselves select and, while continuing in the manufacture of the jars, terminate their liability to account under the contract by giving the plaintiffs notice that they will continue to manufacture; but they will not account or pay. They enjoyed the advantages which they contracted for, and they are bound to pay the consideration there-

'That the learned master erred in his legal conclusion upon this question seems to us too clear for argument. Of course the parties who made this contract could have terminated it on the 14th day of December, 1880, by an agreement then made to do so; but the master does not find, as matter of fact, that it was terminated then by agreement of the parties; but he finds its determination as a matter of law because the defendants, on this date, renounced the license.

'We do not discover anything in the position of the plaintiffs that precludes them from asking for an account up to the termination of the patent. At the time of the filing of the bill in this case, the defendants confessedly had neglected or refused to make monthly statements as required by the contract and were continuing to manufacture jars such as were covered by the plaintiffs' license. The plaintiffs could therefore properly ask for an account; and the fact that the plaintiffs sought for and obtained an injunction, restraining the defendants from manufacturing jars other than those covered by the patent, cannot operate to prevent an account for the whole period of time during which the defendants were engaged in manufacturing jars that confessedly were of the kind covered by the patent. We conclude, as before stated, that the learned master erred in his finding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an account for jars manufactured subsequent to the 24th day of December, 1880.

'The plaintiffs' exceptions raise a further question as to the liability of the defendants to account for jars sold by them, and returned because defective, either from imperfect materials used in the construction or defective workmanship. We think a fair construction of the contract is that the defendants were liable to account and pay for the jars manufactured by them and sold; and that a jar nominally sold, but returned because not a merchantable jar, cannot be considered as a jar sold within the meaning of the contract. We think, therefore, that the master was correct in his finding that jars returned to the defendants because of such defaults as made them unmerchantable should not be included in this accounting.

'The plaintiffs' exceptions raise a further question growing out of the fact of the manufacture of jars by the defendants, alleged by the defendants not to be of a kind covered by the plaintiffs' patent. It will be observed that the defendants, by their contract, agree not to manufacture or sell any jars or jar fillings other than those covered by the plaintiffs' patent during the continuance of the agreement. The plaintiffs' patent seems to have been on a combination of iron and steel in the manufacture of drilling jars, so as to secure the necessary tensile strength in the parts subject to the greatest longitudinal strain, and the hardness of steel to the parts which receive or give the blow, and which are subject to great frictional wear; and this purpose was obtained by welding into the wrought iron jars a steel headpiece to receive the blow, and by making the inner faces of the link bars of steel where the frictional wear is greatest.

'The master finds that 197 jars manufactured by the defendants and included in their return were not made under the letters patent. If the plaintiffs sustained injury by the violation of the contract on the part of the defendants in this respect, they have a remedy; but we do not see how, under the pleadings in the case, and from the evidence as reported by the master, we can adjust the damage which the plaintiffs may have sustained in this accounting. The plaintiffs' bill is for an account for royalties under the contract; and if we go outside of the contract, we cannot see what there is in the evidence before us by which we can fix the amount of royalty which the plaintiffs should receive for such jars manufactured by the defendants, upon which the plaintiffs had no patent and upon which they were not, therefore, entitled to claim royalty at all.

"We are not unmindful of, nor do we intend to disregard, the general rule that when once a court of equity acquires jurisdiction and control of a case it will settle and determine the whole controversy between the parties, but we do not see how we can make it apply here. We are not clearly able to see how the master found from the evidence that there was so great a number as 197 jars that were not covered by the patent. It may be conceded that, as the patent is for a combination of iron and steel so as to obtain certain results, a jar manufactured entirely of iron or entirely of steel would not be covered by the patent and could not, therefore, if we are right in our conclusion above stated, be brought into this account; and the defendants, in their statement of account rendered to the master, returned 197 jars as being made of steel; but, on examination of the defendants' evidence, it appears that the jars in this schedule called steel jars were not made entirely of steel, but were partly iron and partly steel.

"Mr. Seyfang says: 'The steel jars mentioned in my statement as steel jars were not all steel, including boxes and pins.' The same witness further testifies: 'We have made very few of all solid steel.'

"It is quite apparent that the bulk of the 197 jars called steel jars were partly of steel and partly of iron; and the question at once presents itself whether these jars, made as they were, are covered by the patent, and therefore the subject of this account. The patentee claims, in his specifications forming part of the letters patent, after describing the manner of the combination of the iron and steel:

"1. The manufacture of drilling jars of combined iron and steel in which, at least, the part in each half of the jars that receives the blow, and the inner faces of the link jars shall be of steel, substantially as and for the purposes described. 2. The hereinbefore described drilling jars constructed of wrought iron and steel combined substantially in the manner and for the purpose set forth. The draft of the patent, and the description thereof, in the application, shows a hammer face of steel, link bars lined with steel to avoid friction, and the balance of the link bars of iron to obtain tensile strength.

"We incline to adopt the conclusion of the learned master that if the head piece or hammer face is of steel, and the link bars also of steel, it would not be a use of the combination of iron and steel upon which the plaintiffs' patent is based.

"If the master is right in his conclusion from the evidence that the defendants did not avail themselves of the combination of iron and steel as described in the plaintiffs' patent in the manufacture of the 197 jars, we think he did right in excluding them from the account. It is difficult to determine the number made from the evidence; but we cannot say that the number stated by the master, 197, is too great.

"The plaintiffs' exceptions, so far as they relate to the period of time to be covered by this accounting, are sustained. The balance of them are not sustained, but they are overruled. The defendants' exceptions are overruled."

The court entered judgment against the defendants for a sum named, with costs. The defendants thereupon took this appeal.

The specifications of error raise several questions not touched upon in the above opinion.

The answer of the defendants, to the plaintiffs' bill, denied, in the first paragraph, that the plaintiffs were the original inventors or assignees of the inventors of the improvements in drilling jars, or that plaintiffs had the right to the exclusive use of the improvement or to license others; and alleged that such invention was publicly used by others prior to the patent. The plaintiffs demurred to the above paragraph, and the court sustained the demurrer and struck out the paragraph. 2d assignment of error.

The defendants, appellants, further assigned as error the action of the court in sustaining "plaintiffs' exceptions to the master's report, so far as they relate to the period of time to be covered by the accounting," quoting the exceptions; also in dismissing the defendants' exceptions, quoting them and making each a separate assignment. The exceptions were, in substance, that the plaintiffs had no title to the letters patent and had no right to bring this action on the agreement set forth in the bill; that the bill should have been dismissed for want of equity at the costs of the plaintiffs; and that the defendants should not have been ordered to pay to the plaintiffs the sum recommended, with costs.

Messrs. James C. Boyce, N. B. Smiley, David Sterrett and M. F. Elliott, for appellants:

Under the pleadings it must be held that the plaintiffs have no title to the patent mentioned in the bill and agreement. The allegation of that fact in the bill is expressly denied in the answer. Matter of estoppel must be specially pleaded as such.

Per Curiam:

We have no doubt of this being a proper case for a court of equity. The appellants were licensed to use the appellees' property. They were not bound to make any specific number of jars. It was optional with them whether to make any under their license. Having, however, commenced to make them and so continuing, they became obliged to pay so long as they manufactured them, until the expiration of the patent. They were, therefore, obliged to render an account.

We see no error in the conclusion of the learned judge as to the number for which they should be charged, and the sum which they should pay.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

1. A contract to render a patentee monthly statements of all articles made during the previous month and to whom sold, with an agreement to pay a royalty for each article so made during the preceding month, will not include unmerchable articles, under a fair construction of the agreement.
2. In a bill in equity for an account of royalties on patented articles manufactured, articles made in violation of the agreement, but not under the letters patent, can not be included in the account.
3. A patent drilling jar of combined iron and steel, in which the hammer face which receives the blow is of steel, and the link bars lined with steel, to avoid friction, and the balance of the link bars of iron, to obtain tensile strength, will not include a drilling jar with the hammer face of steel and the link bars of steel.
4. Parol evidence to change a written contract considered.

APPEAL and certiorari to review a judgment of the Common Pleas of McKean County, in equity. Affirmed.

This was an appeal by Samuel B. Dick and the Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company from the same decree reported in the next preceding case. The facts are stated in the report of that case.

The defendants alleged at the hearing before the master, that at and before the execution of the contract of license, a parol agreement was entered into between themselves and Mr. Sterrett, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that broken jars should not be taken into account nor royalty paid on them. The evidence on this point was as follows:

R. H. Sterrett testified:

"I am acquainted with the Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company, and was in October, 1878. I was a director of said company at that time, and so continued to the present. * * * In October, 1878, the 16th, I was at the shops of Bovaird & Seyfang in Bradford, Pa., and issued to them this license. (The paper offered.) I was acting as the agent of the Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company and S. B. Dick in the matter. This is my signature as subscribing witness to said paper. I am acquainted with the signature and handwriting of S. B.

Dick. I should say this is his signature. I have seen it a great many times. I signed the "Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company" for them. I saw Bovaird and Seyfang sign the paper referred to at their office in Bradford, Pa. Bovaird and Seyfang were both present at the time of the execution of this contract, signed by one in the presence of the other, and in my presence. The paper was executed in duplicate. I took one of the papers and Bovaird & Seyfang took the other. I can't say which one of them signed the paper. They were both there. The Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company was a corporation and had a common corporate seal. I had not at that time any other office of the corporation except director. I think I saw Dick sign the paper. Dick was not present when Bovaird and Seyfang signed it. I signed it for the company, and then witnessed it. In relation to my conduct and management of their affairs in regard to this patent at and prior to October, 1878, the president, treasurer and secretary of the company told me that I could give licenses to parties who were making jars, and that I should do so and look after the company's interest in that patent. This was in connection with Mr. Dick's part. It was mutually agreed by both parties that I should represent them, to report to them and pay one half the money that was collected to them and the other half to Mr. Dick, which I did."

Q. "I wish to call your attention to the statement of Mr. Seyfang at a former hearing in this case as follows: 'We objected to the contract as printed, raising the question of broken jars; and refused to sign the contract until it was agreed by the licensors to exclude these, to which condition he agreed.' What do you say as to that statement?"

A. "I never agreed that they should have any credit for broken jars. The question wasn't raised. I have seen Exhibit A, the license in this case. On the date of the license, before the execution of the license, I exhibited it to the defendants, executed by Mr. Dick. They examined it and read it. They objected to some of its provisions. * * * The only and principal objection that was made, and that they talked more about and dwelt on more than any other (I think Mr. Bovaird was more particular about it than Mr. Seyfang), was the printed clause in the license requiring them to report and pay royalty on the 5th of every month, on all jars made and sold during the preceding month, and wanted me to change that so that it would read, not earlier than the 10th or 15th of the month. Their reasons for that was that they could not or might not get in their collections so early in the month. I told them that I could not make any changes in the printed form of the license; that I never had and would not, as I had no right to or authority; but in addition I said, that being the only or the principal objection, I would promise them that they could have until the 10th of the month to report, and if they paid their royalty and made their report by the 10th of the month I would make them no trouble. I think there were no other objections made by them to the printed form. I cannot recall any other. The same day the license was executed in duplicate."

J. L. Seyfang testified:

"Prior to our signing of the contract, we objected to the contract as printed—raising the question of broken jars, the injustice of paying royalty on the same. The question was involved, and we refused to sign that contract until it was agreed by the licensors, by Mr. Sterrett their representative, and to which condition he agreed before our signature to that contract—that was that we would not pay and were not to pay for broken jars. This was before we signed the contract, and after that agreement we signed the contract. * * * Upon representation of these facts, as before stated, and with the understanding before testified to, the defendants in this case, Bovaird & Seyfang, signed that article of agreement."

All of the foregoing answer was objected to for the reason that it purported to have relation to conversations and promises of an agent, and was collateral and incompetent.

It was admitted on the part of the counsel for the plaintiffs that R. H. Sterrett acted as agent of the plaintiffs in the execution of the partly printed and partly written contract of the parties in evidence here, and to collect the royalties thereunder, but not as their agent for any undertakings other than those described; that for this purpose the contracts were printed in blank and executed by Samuel B. Dick, one of the plaintiffs, and committed to Mr. Sterrett for execution by the other parties; and plaintiffs denied that there was any authority to Mr. Sterrett to modify the terms of the contract in any way.

Witness: "No one of the plaintiffs but Mr. Sterrett called upon us in this matter. I remember four interviews with Mr. Sterrett before we signed the contract. We never received any communications from the plaintiffs nor wrote any concerning this matter. * * * I think I signed the contract on the day it is dated. The conversations with Mr. Sterrett were at our office in Bradford. The first one was about six weeks prior to the execution of the contract. I did not send for him. The next was probably one or two weeks after the first. The next was some time after; I cannot state how long. The last time, the fourth, was when the contract was signed. I had not asked him to come nor written to him. I did not write to the plaintiffs, nor any of our concern, asking for license. I can't say that Mr. Sterrett exhibited the blank contract at the first conversation. I think he did at the second. Mr. Sterrett and I had a talk. He did not say he could not change any of the terms of the contract, that he had no authority to; nor did he say that he would not change the terms. I told Mr. Sterrett that if we were expected to pay for broken jars we wouldn't sign the contract. I don't remember whether or not I asked him to change the words of the contract."

David Bovaird testified as follows:

Q. State if you were present at any of the conversations with the representative of Dick and the Gibbs & Sterrett Manufacturing Company prior to and at the time of the signing of the license upon which this suit was brought.

A. I was. I couldn't be positive whether I was present on the day the license was signed, but I think I was.

Q. State, Mr. Bovaird, any conversation that there was between the representative of the plaintiffs and the defendants; and any representations made by him to induce you and your partner to sign that license; or any agreement that he made with you concerning what jars royalty should be charged upon.

Objection on the part of the plaintiff on the same ground as to similar question to Mr. Seyfang on the same subject, and this objection is to apply to all questions touching the same subject matter.

A. We had a talk, Mr. Sterrett, Mr. Seyfang and myself. We would not pay for broken jars. Mr. Sterrett made a remark that he couldn't warrant our jars. We told him we didn't ask him to warrant our jars, but if we had to pay for broken jars we shouldn't sign that contract. Now I don't know whether it was at that time that the contract was signed, because there were two or three times that I was present and it was talked about. We had not been manufacturing jars, but we had a jar maker hired to make them. Before the signing of that contract Mr. Sterrett said that we wouldn't need to pay for broken jars, and that he would protect us; that if any were manufactured that were not paying royalty, there would be suits started to make them pay it.

The master found from the evidence as follows: "This parol agreement is denied by Mr. Sterrett; but it is positively stated by both Seyfang and Bovaird and must, therefore, be considered established by a preponderance of testimony. * * * The parol agreement proved neither contradicts nor alters the written license. Under the latter, as already construed, royalty was to be paid only upon jars sold; and a conditional sale therefore, if the conditions should not be fulfilled, would not be subject of royalty."

The plaintiffs excepted to these findings by the master, and the court overruled the exceptions.

The assignments of error raised the questions whether 197 of the jars were made under the letters patent and whether or not they should be included in the account; and whether broken or defective jars should also be included.

Callan v. Lukens, 89 Pa. St. 134; Parson v. Adeler, 8 W. N. C. 72.

Mr. Seyfang and Mr. Bovaird both testify that if the parol agreement had not been made the contract would not have been signed.

But apart from the parol agreement it is only a reasonable construction of the license that it applies to only sound, merchantable jars. It would be inequitable to require the defendants to pay two royalties on only one actual and consummated sale. When the manufacturer replaces a defective set by a sound set, it is evident that there is a sale made of a second set, which would not have been sold, if the first set was good.

The agreement is to be construed most strictly against the plaintiffs as a lease is construed most strongly against the landlord.

Commonwealth v. Sheriff of Phila. Co. 3 Brews. 537.

This contract was in restraint of trade. Therefore equity will not enforce it, but the plaintiffs must be left to their remedies at law.

Keeler v. Taylor, 53 Pa. St. 467; Gompers v. Rochester, 56 Pa. St. 194; Harkinson's App. 78 Pa. St. 196; Gillis v. Hall, 2 Brews. 342.

Per Curiam:

We think a fair construction of the contract imposed no obligation upon the appellees to account for and pay royalty on jars not merchantable. This agrees with the finding of the master and the conclusion of the court. It was correctly held that the parol evidence was not sufficient to change the written contract.

We see no error in the decree.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

RANCK'S APPEAL.

1. In the distribution of an intestate's estate, the next of kin "of the blood of the ancestor or other relation from whom real estate descended or by whom it was given or devised," who alone can take such real estate under the Act of April 27, 1833, must be found entirely within the blood of such ancestor, without regard to the other relationship which they may bear to the intestate.
2. In the distribution of real estate derived from the intestate's paternal grandfather where there are next of kin related to the intestate through his mother, and who are also of the blood of the grandfather, who are four degrees removed from the intestate on the mother's side, but who in tracing relationship through the grandfather are six degrees removed from the intestate, they will be excluded in favor of next of kin, who are of the blood of the grandfather five degrees removed from the intestate.

APPPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Lancaster County, dismissing exceptions to an auditor's report. Affirmed.

The following facts were found by the auditor: Amos Rhoads died intestate, unmarried and without issue, seised of a farm which had been devised to him by his grandfather, John Rhoads. Deceased also owned other real estate which he had acquired by purchase. The balance of the account for distribution was the proceeds of this real estate, sold by order of court for payment of debts. The nearest relatives of Amos Rhoads, on his father's side, were the children of the brothers and sisters of his grandfather, John Rhoads, from whom he had derived the farm as aforesaid. One of these children, Lucy, had married Jacob Rance, who was a brother of Amos Rhoads' mother. She died before the intestate, leaving seven children, the appellants.

Before the auditor, William A. Atlee, Esq., the appellants, urging that they were of the blood of the perquisitor and nearer of kin to the intestate than the children of his grandfather's brothers and sisters, claimed the whole of the estate. The auditor, after reviewing the facts, proceeded:

"Who are the next of kin? The next of kin are to be ascertained by the rules of the civil and not of the canon law.

McDowell v. Addams, 9 Wright, 480.

According to these rules the nearest of kin on the father's side are in the fifth degree, being grandchildren of the common ancestor, the great-grandfather of the intestate; and the nearest of kin on the mother's side are in the third degree, being brothers and sisters of the mother of the intestate; and the children of such brothers and sisters who were dead at the time of intestate's death are in the fourth degree.

"If there were no land here except that purchased by Amos Rhoads, all would therefore go to the next of kin on the mother's side. But some of it came by devise from John Rhoads, the paternal grandfather.

"Section 9 of Act of April 8, 1833, says: 'Provided also, That no person who is not of the blood of the ancestors or other relations from whom any real estate descended or by whom it was given or devised to the intestate, shall, in any of the cases before mentioned, take any estate of inheritance therein; but such real estate, subject to such life estate as may be in existence by virtue of this Act, shall pass to and vest in such other persons as would be entitled by this Act, if the persons not of the blood of such ancestor or other relation had never existed, or were dead at the decease of the intestate.'

"The next of kin on the part of the mother are therefore excluded from participation in the proceeds of the land which the intestate acquired by devise from John Rhoads; while they are entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the land acquired by the intestate by purchase, to the exclusion of the next of kin on the part of the father, being nearer in degree.

"But there is another question raised and ably argued. There is a class of next of kin who are of the blood of the deviser of the land, John Rhoads, being in the sixth degree of kinship with Amos Rhoads on the part of the father. The same persons are in the fourth degree of kinship with the intestate on the part of the mother. They are therefore one degree nearer in kin to the intestate than any of those who claim on part of the father, and they are also of the blood of the father; and it is therefore claimed that they are entitled to all the proceeds of the land devised to the intestate.

"At first sight the claim is plausible, but it cannot bear close investigation. In distributing lands acquired by an intestate by inheritance, gift or devise from an ancestor or relation, we must treat all persons and relationships, not of that blood, as nonexistent; we must search entirely within that blood for next of kin, and cannot go outside of it to see whether there are relations remote in that blood but near outside of it. Whether wisely or unwisely, the Legislature has enacted that land shall be kept within the blood of the perquisitor; and that only those of that blood shall enjoy it; and that the search for those who shall thus enjoy it shall be entirely within that blood, without reference to any other relationship. This claim is, therefore, not allowed by the auditor."

Exceptions were filed by the appellants to the disallowance of this claim by the auditor, which were dismissed by the court and the report confirmed. This appeal was then taken.

Messrs. D. G. Eshleman and A. W. Snader, for appellants:

If the appellants are excluded at all, it must be by the proviso in the ninth section of the Act of April 8, 1833.

Purd. Dig. p. 564, pl. 27; P. L. 318.

But they are of the blood; and they are the next of kin who have any of the blood of John Rhoads, the perquisitor. They have the same blood with the appellees, and they are nearer of kin to the intestate; the appellees being in the fifth degree, while the appellants are in the fourth degree.

The law does not measure fractions of blood. According to Justice Story, in Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. 87 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 357), cited approvingly in Hart's App. 8 Pa. St. 37: "A person is, with the most strict propriety of language, affirmed to be of the blood of another, who has any, however small a portion, of the same blood derived from a common ancestor."

The proviso in the ninth section was intended only to prevent estates crossing over from the family who acquired them into families who had no part in such acquisition.

Roberts' App. 89 Pa. St. 420.

Under the Act of 1833, brothers and sisters of the half blood and their issue take, to the exclusion of more remote kindred of the whole blood and in preference to a deceased uncle of the whole blood.

Hart's App. 8 Pa. St. 32; Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477.

In Bevan v. Taylor, 7 Serg. & R. 397; Lewis v. Gorman, 5 Pa. St. 166 and Maffit v. Clark, 6 Watts & S. 258, the next of kin were not of the blood of the perquisitor. To follow those cases, therefore, would nullify the provision in the seventh section of the Act of 1833, as limited by the ninth section.

Mr. Eugene G. Smith, for appellees:

"The maxim under our statutes, as well as at common law, is, that he who claims an estate descended to an intestate must show himself heir to him from whom it descended as perquisitor."

Lewis v. Gorman, 5 Pa. St. 166.

"He is the propositus and from him the inheritable blood is to be derived."

It is necessary to ascend to the first purchaser, to discover who the "ancestors or other relations" are, and in and through his blood find the next of kin. With the light of this rule the appellees are the next of kin and entitled to this fund.

Roberts' App. 39 Pa. St. 417; Perot's App. 102 Pa. St. 235.

The appellants claim inheritable blood through their mother, Lucy Ranck, who died before the intestate; and they are one degree more remote than her brother and sisters, to whom, with others, the fund was awarded. The appellees are in the fifth degree, and the appellants in the sixth, and therefore not next of kin.

Act of April 8, 1888, § 7, 1 Purd. Dig. 568, pl. 24.

"Consanguinity or kindred is defined by the writers on these subjects to be 'Vinculum personarum ab eodem stipite descendit,' the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor."

2 Bl. Com. *202.

There cannot be two perquisitors from whom to trace the blood in order to fix the next of kin to inherit the real estate devised by one.

The appellants claim all of this fund, when their mother, if living, would be entitled to only one share of it; and they claim through her blood. They certainly cannot contend that the mother could have inherited the whole fund, to the exclusion of her own brother and sisters. She was not next of kin to the intestate, through the blood of the Rancks. She could have no inheritable blood through her husband. She was not of his blood. The appellants' father, if living, would be entitled to none of this fund, because he is not of the blood of the perquisitor. Yet he is the brother of the intestate's own mother and the intestate's next of kin, as are his brother and sisters, who do not claim this fund. Yet, by the accident of death, the children, who are more remote, claim the entire fund, and attempt to exclude all of the class to which their mother belonged.

If the appellants' theory be logically carried out it becomes an absurdity; if their mother were living now they would inherit and exclude even her, through whom they claim their blood, just as they attempt to inherit to the exclusion of her brother and sisters. She would not be next of kin to the intestate and of the blood of the perquisitor. She would be next of kin through the blood of the perquisitor, just as are all the appellees. But she could not be next of kin of the intestate through her husband's blood, by which the appellants fix their kinship. Any argument which the appellants can advance must apply with the same force against their mother, if living, as it will against the appellees.

The question of whole blood and half blood does not enter into the case and therefore the cases of Hart's App. 8 Barr, 87, and Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 481, do not apply.

Per Curiam:

This fund was correctly distributed. The appellants are one degree more remote from the perquisitor than the appellees, to whom the money was decreed. If the contention of the appellants was logically correct and their mother was still living, they would take, to her exclusion, although they now claim their inheritable blood through her.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

Levi SENSENIG, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Henry B. PARRY et al.

1. Counsel fees are not recoverable as legal damages in an action on an injunction bond, conditioned to indemnify for all damage that may be sustained by reason of the injunction.*
2. In an action for damages on a bond in injunction proceedings to restrain tearing down an alleged party wall, preparatory to building a new building, evidence is admissible, to disprove damages, that the new building erected beside the old wall could have been erected without any detention, with the old wall standing.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendants in an action of debt on an injunction bond. Affirmed.

The plaintiff and the defendant Parry were owners of adjoining lots in Lancaster city. The plaintiff, preparatory to building an addition to the rear of a hotel on his lot, began to pull down an old building and wall that stood near the line between the parties. The defendant, alleging that the wall was a party wall, procured a preliminary injunction, August 30, 1880, restraining the plaintiff from interfering with said wall. The condition of the injunction bond given by the defendant was "to indemnify the said Levi Sensenig for all damage that may be sustained by reason of such injunction." The injunction was dissolved on September 28, 1880; the bill was dismissed May 4, 1882; and on appeal to this court the judgment of the court below was affirmed May 31, 1882. Immediately upon the dissolution of the injunction the plaintiff commenced work on the new building. This building, as finally erected, was wholly on the land of the plaintiff, 9½ inches at one end and 20 inches at the other end, from the old wall, which was the subject of the injunction. It was alleged that it was built this way in order to furnish light to the building.

The plaintiff brought suit on the injunction bond against principal and sureties and, on the trial, offered evidence as to the damages. The court refused to admit evidence as to counsel fees paid by plaintiff "for the purpose of having the injunction dissolved." (1st assignment of error.)

To disprove damages, the defendant offered evidence to show that, "with the given distance of 9½ inches at one end and 20 inches at the other, from the wall that was taken down, Sensenig could have erected his building without any detention of his operations, with that wall standing." The plaintiff objected, but the court admitted the evidence. (2d, 3d, 4th and 5th assignments of error.)

The court, Livingston, P. J., after reviewing the proceedings, charged the jury as follows:

"If you find from the whole evidence that Mr. Sensenig could have proceeded with the erection of his building, notwithstanding the injunction, without tearing down or injuring the old wall, which the injunction restrained him from disturbing, and without any additional expense or damage by reason of the injunction, then, and in such case, Mr. Sensenig would only be entitled to any additional expense or damage accruing to him in tearing down the old wall, caused by the injunction."

"If he could not have so proceeded during the continuance of the injunction, but could have proceeded, at additional expense and damage, he would have been entitled under the bond, to recover such damage, in a suit on the bond."

"If you find from the evidence, that Mr. Sensenig could not have proceeded with the erection of, or erected his building, during the continuance of the injunction, by reason of the injunction, without being subject to additional cost and expense; that he was necessarily restrained from proceeding with his building and delayed from August 30 to September 28, 1880, by reason of the injunction and such delay consequent upon it, he would be entitled to recover by your verdict such an amount of damages, as he has, by the evidence produced before you, satisfied you he has sustained by reason of this injunction, and by reason of this injunction only."

"If you find that no such damages have resulted, of course you should allow none."

"You will, under no view you may take of the matter, allow any remote or merely consequential or speculative damages. You must allow no damages except such as flow directly from the injunction, as its immediate consequences; for the liability upon the injunction bond is limited to such damages as arise from the suspension or invasion of vested legal rights by the injunction. Our own supreme court has said that the injunction bond binds a defendant to pay all such damages as may be sustained by reason of the injunction bond."

"If you find that any damages have been sustained by Mr. Sensenig, the plaintiff, by reason of the injunction, you will then have to ascertain what such damages were, of what they were composed, and their amount; extra labor thereby occasioned and paid for; coal rendered necessary and used; stoves rendered necessary and their moving; mortar lost by freezing; extra cost of plastering; royalty for use of yard; rent; and such damages as were really occasioned by reason of the injunction only, you may take into consideration."

"The items of damage claimed you will consider. See whether or not they are sustained by the evidence. You have heard the testimony from the witnesses on the stand, as they were examined before you. These witnesses were all competent under the law; their credibility is for you."

"If you find that Mr. Sensenig has sustained damages by reason of the injunction, and find that the amount of such damages with interest is less than the amount of the bond with interest from the time the injunction was dissolved, September 28, 1880, you will return a verdict for plaintiff, for the amount of such damages."

"If you find that such damages exceed the amount of the bond and interest upon it from September 28, 1880, you will return your verdict for the amount of the principal of the bond with interest from September 28, 1880."

"If you find from the evidence that Mr. Sensenig could have gone on with his building, notwithstanding the injunction, without taking down or injuring the old wall, but at an additional expense, he would be entitled to recover the amount of such additional expense as the injunction occasioned."

"If you find from the evidence that Mr. Sensenig sustained no damage by reason of the injunction, your verdict will be for the defendants."

Verdict for defendants and judgment thereon. The plaintiff took this writ, specifying for error the assignments above mentioned and the portions of the charge in brackets.

Messrs. D. G. Eshleman, S. H. Reynolds and A. J. Eberly, for plaintiff in error:

The Act of May 6, 1844 (1 Purd. Dig. 699), provides: "No injunction shall be issued by any court or judge until the party applying for the same shall have given bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by said court or judge, conditioned to indemnify the other party for all damages that may be sustained by reason of such injunction."

The court below decided that counsel fees could not be allowed as damages, basing the decision upon the ruling of Stopp v. Smith, 71 Pa. St. 285, and Good v. Mylin, 8 Pa. St. 51, where it is held that in tort the plaintiff cannot recover as damages, compensation for his necessary expenses together with counsel fees.

The court, in following those cases, failed to see the distinction between an action in tort and an action in debt on a bond, provided by the Legislature to indemnify against all damages that may be sustained by reason of an injunction.

If the defendant had not issued his injunction, the plaintiff would not have been delayed with his building, to his great damage; and he would not have been under the necessity of employing counsel. The payment of counsel fees as well as the other damages were the direct result of the injunction. If the plaintiff had not paid counsel fees the injunction would not have been dissolved, and he would thereby have been deprived of his right of property. What right had the defendant to put the plaintiff into a position which obliged him either to expend money for counsel fees or to lose his property?

In a great number of other States the question has arisen and it has always been held that, in actions on injunction bonds, counsel fees and other expenses incurred in procuring dissolution have been allowed as damages. If the rule is a good one in one place it ought to be good in all. If the reasoning upon which it is based is sound it ought to be adopted here.

In ascertaining damages in an action upon an injunction bond, a reasonable sum may be allowed for expenses incurred in procuring a dissolution.

High, Inj. § 967; Hill. Inj. chap. II, § 54.

Counsel fees paid in procuring a dissolution of an injunction are allowed in an action on the bond.

High, Inj. § 973.

In High on Injunctions, § 973, the rule is thus stated: "A reasonable amount of compensation, paid as counsel fees in procuring the dissolution of an injunction, may be recovered in an action upon the bond, if the injunction was improperly or wrongfully sued out, the amount being limited to fees paid to counsel for procuring dissolution, and not for defending the entire case. Counsel fees in such cases are regarded as a proper subject of consideration in estimating the damages incurred, the loss being as direct and immediate as any other."

In Derry Bank v. Heath, 45 N. H. 524, the condition of the bond was "that whereas, an injunction has this day been issued by the Hon. J. E. Sargent, one of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court of said State, against said Derry Bank, upon the petition of said Albe C. Heath, now if the said Heath shall pay and satisfy to said bank all such damages as may be occasioned to the said bank by reason of said injunction in case the proceeding in which the said injunction has been issued shall be determined against himself, then this obligation shall be void, otherwise in force." It was held that the plaintiff should be allowed as damages in the case such reasonable counsel fees as they have paid or are liable to pay to their counsel.

In Edwards v. Bodine, 11 Paige, 224, the condition of the bond "to pay the party enjoined such damages as he may sustain by reason of the injunction" was held to be broad enough to embrace the necessary counsel fees incurred by the defendant in getting rid of the injunction.

In Corcoran v. Judson, 24 N. Y. 106, the ruling was the same.

In Prader v. Grim, 13 Cal. 585, the usual bond having been given, an order was made to show cause why an injunction should not issue. A restraining order "in the meantime" was issued. On hearing, the order was dissolved, injunction denied and suit dismissed. In an action on the bond it was held that counsel fees for dissolving the order were recoverable.

In Ryan v. Anderson, 25 Ill. 872, the condition of the bond was to pay "all moneys and costs due or to become due, and such damages as shall be awarded them, in case said injunction herein granted shall be dissolved," etc. In an action on the bond it was held that the counsel fees should be allowed as damages.

The 2d, 3d and 4th assignments of error were to the admission of expert testimony. When "experts" are called for the purpose of relieving the obligor in an injunction bond, the jury ought at least to be instructed, in accordance with the views of Dr. Wharton, that such testimony should be received with great caution. 1 Whart. Ev. § 454.

The first part of the charge of the court objected to ignores the fact that the wall, the ground and building was Sensesig's and that he could use his property as he pleased. The other part of the charge objected to, while probably legally correct and intelligible to a lawyer, should have been explained to the jury.

Messrs. Wm. Aug. Atlee and B. Frank Eshleman, for defendants in error:

"In estimating damages sustained by the improper issuing of an injunction, courts proceed upon equitable grounds; and while it is difficult to fix any precise rule or standard for determining the damages upon dissolution, it may be said generally that nothing will be allowed which is not the actual, natural and proximate result of the wrong committed. And where no damages have been actually incurred, none should be assessed."

High, Inj. § 964.

Counsel for plaintiff in error have cited High on Injunctions, § 973, and analyzed many cases, all of which and more are cited by High to sustain his position, to show that counsel fees are allowed as damages, in some States. They are not in Pennsylvania. In this State for a time they seem to have been allowed; but in Good v. Mylin, 8 Pa. St. 51, this court restored the true rule, Gibson, C. J., saying:

"To overrule decisions so recent and direct must cast a doubt on the stability of judicial decision. Yet it is better to eradicate an erroneous principle, while it has scarce taken root, than to let it grow up into a fixed rule of property;" and the judgment of the court below was reversed because counsel fees had been allowed as damages.

In Stopp v. Smith, 71 Pa. St. 285, this court reversed a judgment where counsel fees had been allowed, saying: "The principle was exploded in Good v. Mylin," and adhered to that ruling.

In Murphy v. Jarvis, 1 Phila. 84, Judge Sharswood adhered to the rule and held counsel fees not recoverable as damages.

If the plaintiff had sued the defendant for the damages directly, he would have had to sue in tort; the bond gives him security for the payment of such damages as he could have recovered by direct suit; and therefore the rules in actions in tort are directly applicable here.

The same general principle which we are now considering controls compensation on the subject of counsel fees. The law awards to the party plaintiff his taxable costs; but the fees which he pays to counsel are not taken into consideration, either because they are too remote, or perhaps because the law does not see fit to look with too harsh an eye on those who appeal to its protection. This is uniformly true in all cases of contract.

Sedg. Dam. § 99.

In Haverstick v. Erie Gas Co. 5 Casey, 254, an action of covenant, this court says: "The plaintiff cannot recover damages for having to employ counsel to bring this suit." In Pennsylvania, therefore, the rule that counsel fees cannot be recovered is the same in actions in tort and actions on contract, and the ruling of the court below is correct.

As to the other assignments, it is enough to say that no point or request for ruling was presented to the court below on the subject.

Per Curiam :

There was no error in disallowing the evidence of counsel fees paid by the plaintiff. It is not such legal damage as is specified in the condition of the injunction bond, as to permit a recovery therefor. Good v. Mylin, 8 Pa. St. 51; Stopp v. Smith, 71 Pa. St. 285.

All other alleged damages "sustained by reason of such injunction" was a question of fact, and the evidence relating thereto was submitted to the jury in a clear and correct charge. There was no error in the admission of evidence tending to disprove damages.

Judgment affirmed.

Alexander REESER, Appt.,

v.

John REESER.

Equity will, at the instance of a trustee, restrain, by preliminary injunction, a cestui que trust, from issuing execution on a judgment in his own name, where there is a dispute as to whether or not the judgment is included in the trust.

A PPEAL from a decree of the Common Pleas of York County, in equity, restraining by injunction the collection of a judgment. Affirmed.

The bill in equity, filed September 9, 1885, by the plaintiff below, the appellee, alleged that William Reeser died, having made a will, probated March 11, 1872, in which he provided inter alia as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my son Alexander, during his lifetime, a tract of land (describing it) subject to the payment of $300 to my estate; and further I appoint my son Abraham Reeser trustee over the estate of my son Alexander."

The residue of the estate, after payment of legacies, etc., was directed to be shared among his children "share and share alike." Abraham Reeser died without having acted in the trust, and the plaintiff was appointed trustee in his place by the orphans' court, October 8, 1872.

The bill further alleged that Alexander Reeser was a "man of weak mind and of unstable purposes and easily led by others." He lived with different brothers for a time and with a nephew, and with Jacob Mohr, a brother-in-law, who was one of the executors of William Reeser's will. Jacob Mohr, by the plaintiff's consent and in subordination to his wishes and under his direction, assisted in the management of Alexander's estate, taking notes for money loaned, and crediting interest payments thereon. The notes were written in the name of Alexander, but with one or two exceptions they were retained in the custody of Jacob Mohr.

In the spring of 1883 Alexander loaned $500 to John A. Bahn, upon his judgment exemption note, with S. L. Bahn as security, and received one year's interest. On April 22, 1884, judgment was entered on this note in the name of Alexander, and interest paid to the plaintiff in the spring of 1885. Since 1884 Alexander has lived in Adams County with the plaintiff's son, who is married to the daughter of one Blauser. The plaintiff alleged that he was informed that his son and the said Blauser had acquired complete control over Alexander, and that they had procured him to execute a power of attorney to Blauser to collect his moneys and manage his affairs; and that they had procured Alexander to execute to plaintiff's son a promissory note for $900, without any or sufficient consideration, and to execute a paper appointing Blauser trustee. The plaintiff further alleged, on information and belief, that Alexander or those who thus represent him was about to issue execution on the judgment against Bahn; that the money loaned to Bahn was trust money, under the will of William Reeser; and praying for an injunction to restrain the execution.

The affidavit of Alexander Reeser, the defendant, alleged that the trust created by the will related only to the management of the real estate and was so understood and acted upon by John Reeser, the appellee; that the said John Reeser, on March 28, 1881, nearly nine years after his appointment, filed his first account as trustee, in which is embraced not an item of the personal property now claimed as covered by the trust but only income or proceeds of crops annually raised on the real estate; that the other moneys and property bequeathed to the said Alexander were absolute bequests and not upon any trust; and the same, amounting to $1,323.75, were paid over to him by the plaintiff and Jacob Mohr, the executors of the will, who took a release for the same, duly acknowledged and recorded.

The affidavit further alleged that the deponent was owner of about $2,000 received from his father in his lifetime and about $1,000 of his own earnings; that these sums with their accretions amounted to about $6,000; and by reason of the commingling of these sums it was impossible to ascertain from which source the $500 loan to Bahn came.

The defendant denied that he was of weak mind, or that Blauser or others had complete control over him, or that Mohr had acted as his agent in subordination to the plaintiff; and alleged that if interest had been paid by Bahn to the plaintiff, it was without the defendant's knowledge or consent and he would hold the maker for it. The defendant further alleged that he had left his brothers because they did not treat him kindly, and that they only wanted his money.

Affidavits were filed by both parties in support of their allegations.

On June 8, 1885, John Reeser filed a second account in the register's office of York County, as trustee under the will of William Reeser, deceased, in which he charged himself with "note vs. Bahn, in hands of Alexander," $500, together with other notes, etc., to which exceptions were filed, which are still pending.

The court, Gibson, J., granted a preliminary injunction, delivering the following opinion:

"As this is a case between a trustee and the cestui que trust and involves the question of an active trust, as regards the personal estate bequeathed to Alexander Reeser, under the will of William Reeser, deceased, as well as the extent to which the trust declared in the will is simple or special, it is peculiarly within the province of a court of equity; and as the application of the plaintiff for a special injunction is for the temporary restraint of the defendant from the collection of moneys alleged to belong to the trust, I think it is proper that the injunction should be granted until the final hearing.

"And now, October 10, 1885, this cause came on to be heard on a motion for a special injunction, and was argued by counsel on affidavits; whereupon, on consideration, it is ordered and decreed that, security being given in the sum of $1,000, the defendant his agents or attorneys be restrained from the collection of said judgment by execution or otherwise, until the further order of the court."

The appellant took this writ, assigning for error the action of the court in granting the injunction.

Messrs. J. C. Neely, H. L. Fisher and George G. Fisher, for appellant:

The legal title to the judgment is in the appellant. It did not become so by any trick, fraud or mistake. Equity was never intended to be used to obstruct the collection of debts.

Matthew A. VAN WINKLE, Complainant,
v.

Matthew ARMSTRONG et al.

In a suit by an assignee for the benefit of creditors of a firm, and as to the individual estates of assignors for the benefit of their individual creditors, to rectify the deed of assignment, because of the absence thereof of words of inheritance, and to make it so that it may convey the real estate in this State in fee; where the object of defendant is to get a decree in his favor, for a debt due by the other assignor, and to collect the amount thereof out of his property situated in this State, a cross bill is not necessary. He cannot involve complainant in a litigation in this suit, for the purpose of establishing his debt. The allegations in the cross bill tending to establish the debt may be regarded, so far as complainant is concerned, as averments that defendant is a creditor in this State, and of the firm, and is therefore entitled to resist the application to rectify the deed of assignment.

MOTION to strike out, so far as the complainant is concerned, so much of the answer of Matthew Armstrong to bill to rectify deed of assignment as is by way of cross bill. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. M. Colie, for the motion.

Mr. S. C. Mount, contra.

Ranyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

• The bill is filed to rectify a joint and several deed of assignment made in New York, in January, 1883, by William and Matthew Armstrong, the members of the firm of M. Armstrong & Sons, to the complainant, for the benefit, so far as the partnership assets are concerned, of the creditors of the firm, and as to the individual estates of the assignors, for the benefit of their respective individual creditors. The deed purports to convey all the property of the assignors. It does not pass the title in fee to real estate in this State, because of the absence thereof of words of inheritance. In view of that defect, Matthew Armstrong made another assignment, a separate one, in March following.

William Armstrong had real estate in Hudson County in this State. He has made no assignment except that which this suit is brought to correct. The bill states that that deed was filed in the office of the register of Hudson County in January, 1886; that Matthew Armstrong claiming that the firm was indebted to him as surviving executor of Matthew Armstrong, deceased, proved the debt and received a dividend thereon from the assets of the firm under the assignment, and that afterwards he caused an action at his suit as such executor to be begun against himself and William Armstrong, in Hudson Circuit Court, for the recovery of the debt; in which suit judgment was entered by default on service of a summons upon himself alone, and that he has issued execution upon the judgment and has caused it to be levied upon real estate in Hudson County which was owned by William Armstrong at the time of making the assignment.

The bill charges that the judgment is fraudulent and was intended to defeat the assignment, and that the defendant Matthew Armstrong, as executor of Matthew Armstrong, deceased, is indebted to William Armstrong in a sum greatly exceeding the amount of the claim upon which the judgment was founded. Matthew Armstrong has answered. Part of his answer is by way of cross bill against the complainant and William Armstrong. In the cross bill he states that William Armstrong has taken steps to set aside the judgment, on the ground that Matthew Armstrong, the plaintiff therein, and Matthew Armstrong, defendant, are the same person. He also alleges that the claim for the recovery of which the action was instituted is a valid one, and claiming that if not cognizable at law it is in equity, he insists that he is entitled to have it paid out of any property of the firm or of the members thereof in this State, in preference to any claim of the assignee to such property under the assignment. The complainant moves to strike out the answer by way of cross bill, so far as he is concerned.

The object of the bill is to rectify the assignment so that it may convey the real estate of William Armstrong in this State in fee. The assignment, so far as the partnership debts and the individual debts of Matthew Armstrong are concerned, provided for preferences. It is contrary to the policy of our law to recognize such an assignment as against the claims of persons domiciled here. Varnum v. Camp, 1 Green, 326; Moore v. Bonnell, 2 Vroom, 90.

The bill not only attacks the judgment but avers that Matthew Armstrong, upon an accounting by him as executor, would be found to be indebted to William Armstrong to an amount exceeding the amount of the claim upon which the suit was brought. It seems to me to be quite clear that the cross bill is not necessary to Matthew Armstrong's defense. His object in filing it is to get a decree of this court in his favor as executor against William Armstrong for the debt and to collect the amount of it out of the property of the latter in this State. He insists, in effect, by his answer that in equity his claim should be satisfied out of that property before rectifying the assignment. That defense can be set up without a cross bill. He cannot involve the complainant in a litigation in this suit for the purpose of establishing his debt as against William Armstrong and collecting it out of William Armstrong's property. The allegations in the cross bill tending to establish the debt may, however, be regarded, so far as the complainant is concerned, as averments that he is a New Jersey creditor of the firm and is therefore entitled to resist the application to rectify the assignment. The motion will be granted (but without costs) and the answer (which is not sworn to) will be so amended that the matter exhibited by way of cross bill shall, so far as the complainant is concerned, stand as part of the answer proper.

August SEEMAN et al.

When a temporary injunction to restrain eviction under an action of ejectment, granted on a bill not stating that the ejectment action had proceeded to judgment, is continued after it appears from the answer that judgment had been obtained in said action, the complainant must give such security as would have been required upon the granting of the injunction had it been known that a judgment had been entered in the ejectment action—the bond to cover damages from the commencement of the injunction suit.

BILL for relief. On motion to dissolve injunction upon bill and answer. Motion denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. P. Tuller, for the motion.

Mr. F. F. Hogate, contra.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit for an injunction, to prevent the defendants Greaves and Seeman from turning the complainants out of possession of certain land in Cumberland County, by means of an action of ejectment brought by Seeman against them. The property is the subject of litigation in this court in another pending suit brought by the complainants against Greaves. Seeman claims the property under a tax title; and the bill in this case charges that Greaves and Seeman have colluded together for the purpose of evicting the complainants by means of the tax title, and the ejectment suit thereon.

It states that the ejectment suit is not at issue.

The answer says that the suit was indeed not at issue at the time of filing the bill, but that a judgment by default had been entered in that action; and that at the time when the injunction was served the sheriff had already served an execution issued on that judgment. The complainants however are still in possession.

It appears from the statements of counsel on the argument that an application (still pending) has been made to set aside the judgment. The case is one in which it is proper, in the exercise of a sound discretion, notwithstanding the denial in the answer of the facts upon which the equity of the bill rests, to retain the injunction until the final hearing.

But the complainants must give such security, according to the 125th Rule (the amount to be fixed by a special master of Cumberland County), as would have been required upon the granting of the injunction had it been known that a judgment had been entered in the ejectment suit; and the bond is to cover damages from the commencement of this suit.

No costs of this motion will be awarded to either side.

v.

Horatio G. ZANE et uz.

Defendants, in a suit to compel them to produce a will in their possession, held, after delivering up the will, to have been in the wrong originally and liable for costs.

(Decided August 24, 1886.)

BILL for relief. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Cochran and M. P. Grey, for complainant.

Mr. R. S. Clymer, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit was brought by the executor of the will of Rachel Ward, deceased, late of Salem County, against Lavinia Zane, the daughter of the testatrix, and Horatio G. Zane, her husband. The bill states that the will was, soon after the death of the testatrix, delivered to Mrs. Zane, at her request, by the executor, who in delivering it to her acted in ignorance of his duty in the matter; that he afterwards repeatedly demanded it of the defendants in order that he might present it for probate; but they refused to deliver it to him. It prays an answer on oath, and an injunction to prevent the defendants from destroying, injuring or altering the instrument, and that they may be required to produce it.

By their answer the defendants admit that they have possession of the will, deny that they have ever refused to produce it and allege that on the contrary they have, since it came to their hands, always been ready to deliver it to the complainant on request, but that he has never asked them to do so. On a motion made to dissolve the injunction, they delivered up the will in open court and it has since been admitted to probate. The only question to be decided is as to their liability to pay the costs of the suit.

It appears from the testimony that the will was delivered up by the complainant to Mrs. Zane (who was very much dissatisfied with it) at her request; and that she so obtained it with a view of suppressing it if she could lawfully do so. She was the testatrix's only heir at law and was her next of kin. She deposited it for safe keeping with Rev. Mr. Stultz, who kept it until October, 1884, when he returned it to her. On receiving it from him she gave it to her husband, who had control of it from that time until the bringing of this suit. It does not appear where he kept it. Mrs. Zane swears that she herself did not know. From this testimony it would seem that it was secreted by him. The complainant made three several demands for it at different periods, but without success. One of them was he says in October, 1884. He swears that on that occasion both Mr. and Mrs. Zane, with very strong expressions of determination, declared that the will should never be admitted to probate if they could prevent it. He testifies that another occasion was in July, 1885, and that then Mrs.

Zane said she did not know who had the will and that she did not know whether her husband did. The complainant swears that he could get no satisfactory information as to the will, from either her or her husband. He is corroborated by the testimony of Adin Beckett who was present at that conversation. Immediately after that demand the suit was brought.

The preponderance of evidence is with the complainants. The defendant must pay costs.

William H. SPINNING, Complainant,
v.
Harriet SPINNING.

A widow in possession under the second section of the statute concerning dower, giving her the right to hold her husband's homestead until her dower is assigned, is not a tenant for life, and is not, therefore, bound to keep down interest on an incumbrance, and to pay taxes and to make necessary annual repairs.

(Filed July 23, 1886.)

BILL to compel a widow in possession of the homestead property to pay taxes, etc. On final hearing on bill and answer and proofs taken in open court. Dismissal advised.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Franklin M. Olds, for complainant.
Mr. Samuel H. Pennington, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The only question in dispute in this case is, whether a widow, who remains in the house of her husband after his death until dower is assigned, is, while so in possession, subject to the duties of a tenant for life, that is, bound to keep down the interest on incumbrances, to pay ordinary taxes and to make necessary annual repairs. It is well settled that these burdens must be borne by a life tenant. 1 Wash. R. P. 96, § 25, 25a, 115 § 81. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 488.

And a tenant in dower, like other life tenants, is subject to them. 4 Kent, Com. 75; 2 Scrib. Dow. 732.

This obligation has been extended in this State so as to make it the duty of a person entitled to the interest of a fund for life to pay the tax assessed against the principal of the fund. Holcombe v. Holcombe, 12 C. E. Green, 473; S. C. on appeal, 2 Stew. 597.

The reason assigned for imposing this duty on the person entitled to the interest, is stated as follows by Justice Van Syckel: "So long as the life tenant enjoys the entire produce of the fund, he should be required to keep down the taxes on it; otherwise the fund itself must become impaired, and the entire burden be thrown upon those who take the fund at his death."

The obligation of a widow to perform the duties of a life tenant while in possession under the statute is put upon the ground that the right given to her by the statute is, in substance, a life estate. Unless this position can be maintained, it is admitted she ought not to be held liable to the duties of a life tenant. Other tenants, such as tenants for years, from year to year, and at will, are not, in the absence of a contract to that effect, subject to them. They rest alone on tenants for life. The widow's right is given by these words: "That until dower be assigned to her, it shall be lawful for the widow to remain in, and to hold and enjoy the mansion house of her husband and the mesuage or plantation thereto belonging, without being liable to pay any rent for the same." Rev. 820, § 2.

The purpose of this provision, as it seems to me, is to confer a right of possession similar to an estate or tenancy at will rather than to create a life estate. The language employed is manifestly much more appropriate to raise a right of that kind than for the creation of a life estate. The first and most important provision of the statute, it will be observed, is that the widow can only remain in possession until her dower is assigned. When that is done her estate ceases and her right is gone. Either she or the heir may have dower assigned. She may also surrender her possession at any time. So that the duration of her right depends entirely upon the will of herself and the heir, and like other tenants at will, her right may be determined, at any time, either at the will of the person in possession or the person entitled to the reversion. It is true her occupation may be lengthened out to the end of her life, and she may thus enjoy what is equivalent to a life estate; but her possession can only have that duration when such is the joint will of herself and the heir; and such may be the extent of the duration of a tenancy at will in any case where the parties to the demise so desire.

Judicial opinion is not entirely uniform as to the nature of the right given by this and similar statutes. Under a statute substantially similar to ours, the Supreme Court of Illinois have held that a widow while in possession is bound to pay taxes and keep the premises in repair. Wheeler v. Dawson, 63 Ill. 54.

They do not, however, place her liability on the ground that her right is an estate for life, but on the broader ground that it is equitable, inasmuch as she is entitled to the whole produce, that she should bear these burdens. The court says: "Being entitled to use and occupy the homestead without accounting for the profits and gains made from it, no one would say that she should not, in justice and equity, pay the taxes and keep the premises in repair. We are aware of no principle of law or equity that would impose the duty on the heir to pay the taxes and keep up the repairs of the farm for the use of the widow, when she is in the receipt of all the rents and profits." This view, it will be perceived, pays no attention to the duration of the widow's right, nor to the object which the Legislature had in view in creating it, and entirely overlooks the fact that the law has always highly favored the rights of persons of this class.

Justice Ford, in Ackerman v. Shelp, 3 Halst. 125, in deciding a motion to strike out a notice accompanying a plea of the general issue, giving notice of the special matter which the defendant intended to give in evidence under the plea, said incidentally that the estate given to the widow by this statute is a freehold for life, unless sooner defeated by the act of the heir; and Justice Elmer, in Budd v. Hiler, 3 Dutch. 48, defines her right in the same way, adding, however, that her estate may be determined either by her own act, or that of the heir; thus giving, as I understand it, a perfectly accurate description of an estate at will. The widow's possession can only endure so long as she and the heir so will; and either may at any time determine it by the mere exercise of his or her will.

In the subsequent case of Smallwood v. Bilderback, 1 Harr. 497, Justice Ford speaks of the widow's right as a privilege, and such is the designation given to it by Chief Justice Beasley in McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, 7 C. E. Green, 505, and by Vice Chancellor Dodd in Bleecker v. Hennion, 8 C. E. Green, 128. The latter says: "It is a privilege preceding, but in nowise preventing or impeding, the assignment or disposal of her dower."

It is plain, I think, when we look at the language used, and also consider the object which the Legislature had in view, in the enactment of this statute, that the right given to the widow is not a life estate but may be accurately described as a privilege in the nature of a tenancy at will. By Magna Charta the widow had a right to tarry in the chief house of her husband for forty days after his death and to have maintenance, for that period, out of his estate. The object was to give her a home. Our statute was intended to amplify that right, by extending her right of possession until her dower was assigned. The Legislature meant, undoubtedly, that she should hold for the additional period, beyond the forty days, upon the same terms that she had a right to hold for the forty days.

"The purpose of the Act," says the Chief Justice in McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, supra, "is obviously to provide a home for the widow until her dower be assigned, as well as to put a compulsion on the heir to make the assignment." To treat her as a life tenant while she is in the enjoyment of a mere fugitive right, which has been given to her simply as a temporary provision, and to constrain the heir to put her in possession of what she is entitled to permanently, would serve rather to frustrate than effect the legislative will. And although the Legislature, in defining the terms upon which the widow shall hold, use the word rent, it is quite evident, I think, that what they meant was that she should hold without being subject to any charge whatever.

This question has already been dealt with by this court. In Cronley v. Cronley, 13 Stew. 80, the Chancellor held that a widow, while in possession under this statute, of her husband's homestead, was not bound to keep down the interest on a mortgage thereon. This adjudication, of course, settled the law of this court.

In a previous case, decided orally, without argument and without much consideration, and making a free application of the principle established by Holcombe v. Holcombe, that he who takes the benefits of property should bear its burdens, I held that a widow was bound, while in possession, to keep down the charges on the land which she enjoyed. A careful examination of the question with the aid of a full argument has satisfied me that that conclusion is erroneous, and that it should be held, both according to principle and precedent, that she is not subject to that duty.

UNITED NEW JERSEY RAILROAD & CANAL CO. et al., Complainants,

To induce the court to entertain favorably an application, made after final decree, for leave to file a supplemental or amended answer setting up facts known to defendant when the original answer was filed, there must be some special ground; it must appear that hardship will result to defendant if permission be not accorded, and that he is not in fault for not having set up the defense in his answer originally.

MOTION for leave to file supplemental answer. Denied.

Suit to establish and enforce the liability of the defendant, the Long Dock Company, to pay to the complainants part of certain moneys paid by the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Company to perfect and defend its title to land in Jersey City, part of the Harsimus Cove property conveyed to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company by trustees for the Long Dock Company and others, in pursuance of an agreement made September 10, 1867. By that agreement it was provided that in locating the division line, the title of the whole tract should, for the sake of convenience of division, be deemed equally good and valid; and that if at any time afterwards either of the Companies should be dispossessed of any portion of the tract conveyed to it or its assigns by virtue of the agreement, or should be put to any cost or expense in defending its title thereto, or in extinguishing any outstanding title or claim against it, then the other party should bear its proportion of such loss and expense, according to its proportion of interest in the entire property, which should be a lien on the part set off and conveyed to it.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, for the motion.
Messrs. J. B. Vredenburg and J. D. Bedle, contra.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The defendants apply by petition for leave to file a supplemental answer setting up the fact that part of the land set off and conveyed to the Long Dock Company under the agreement of September 10, 1867, was land under water, the title to which was in the State; that the defendants have extinguished that title as to part of the land, by filling in and docking, and that as to the rest the title is still in the State; and claiming that the complainants' proportion of the cost of perfecting the title to the last mentioned part at the same price as that fixed by the commissioners for the State's title to land under water, set off and conveyed under the agreement to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company, and also the cost of extinguishing the title to the other part by filling and docking, should be allowed to the defendants as an offset in this suit against the amount found due from them to the complainants.

The cause has been decided upon final hearing (11 Stew. Eq. 142) and the defendants appealed from the final decree to the court of errors and appeals, and the decree was affirmed.

When the petition was filed, the testimony under the reference ordered by the decree had been closed, and the matters had been partially summed up before the master, one of the counsel upon each side having been heard thereon. This is in fact an application for leave to amend the answer, for all the facts which it is proposed to set up in the so called supplemental answer existed, and were known to the defendants when they filed their answer in the cause.

To induce the court to entertain favorably an application of this kind at so late a stage in the suit, there must be some special ground, some cogent reason for so doing; it must appear that hardship will result to the defendant if the permission be not accorded, and that he is not in fault for not having set up the defense in his answer originally. No such ground is shown here and there was no good reason why the defense was not set up in the answer. If the defense is valid now it of course would have been equally so then. The only excuse presented is that the defendants were advised that this suit could not be successful. But obviously that cannot avail them. They might have tested the bill by demurrer but they did not do so. They not only permitted the cause to go to final hearing without applying to amend the answer, but they delayed applying until after the proceedings upon the reference under the decree were almost at an end. Such delay is inexcusable. No hardship will ensue to them by denying this application.

The agreement provides that if either party shall be dispossessed of any portion of the tract conveyed to them or their assigns, by virtue of the agreement, or shall be put to any cost or expense in defending their title thereto, or in extinguishing any outstanding title or claim against the same, then the other party shall bear their proportion of such loss and expense according to their proportion of interest in the property, and that such proportion shall be a lien on the part set off and conveyed to such other party.

This suit is not a suit in partition nor is it of that nature. It is merely a suit to recover the price paid to perfect the title to certain lands set off and conveyed to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company under the agreement. The decree will of course be no bar to the collection by the defendants, from the complainants, of any money which they may now or hereafter be entitled to recover from them, under or by virtue of that provision of the agreement. The agreement gives a lien for such money, upon all the property set off and conveyed to the other party under the agreement.

It is not alleged or even suggested that the defendants have any reason to apprehend loss in case they are not permitted to offset such moneys in this suit. Whether they are entitled to recover from the complainants money which they have neither paid nor been called upon to pay, and whether the expense of docking and filling is, under the circumstances, to be regarded as expense of extinguishing the State's title within the provisions of the agreement, are questions which, under the circumstances, it would not be just to compel the complainants to litigate in this suit. They ought not to be subject to the delay which would necessarily be occasioned by permitting the defendants to introduce those matters now.

The petition will be dismissed, with costs.

- *1. The right of a mortgagor to compel a mortgagee in possession to account for the rental value of the mortgaged premises is, in a suit by the mortgagee to foreclose, a pure matter of defense, which the mortgagor may avail himself of by answer.
2. The new facts which may properly be introduced into a pending litigation, by means of a cross bill, are such, and such only, as are so directly and closely connected with the cause of action on which the original bill is founded as to render the cross suit a mere auxiliary of the original suit, or a graft or dependency upon it.
3. A purchaser of an equity of redemption, at judicial sale, takes the land burdened with the mortgage, and he has no right, therefore, to ask that some other fund be applied in discharge of the mortgage debt in relief of his estate.
4. The personal estate of a decedent is the primary fund for the payment of his debts; and an heir, or devisee, or widow has a right to have it so applied in relief of the land which they may take, but this right belongs to them alone. Their alienee or mortgagee has no such right.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to foreclose a mortgage made by John Laible and Johanna, his wife, to William Ortlund, bearing date July 2, 1860. The mortgage embraces a tract of land situate in the City of Newark, and was given to secure the payment of $3,500 with interest, at the end of a year from its date. The complainant obtained title to the mortgage, by assignment, on the 4th of March, 1881. He was at that time in possession of the mortgaged premises. John Laible, the mortgagor, died testate, on the 21st of August, 1862. At the time of his death, he was the owner of a large brewery in the City of Newark, in which he was carrying on the business of a brewer. By his will he directed that his business should be continued after his death. This direction was obeyed, and the defendants (Ferry and Akin) became large creditors of the business, furnishing almost all the malt that the business required. The amount remaining due to them in 1874 exceeded $65,000. They filed their bill in this court, in that year, to obtain a decree, adjudging what part of John Laible's estate should be held to have been embarked by him in business, and also directing that they and the other creditors of the business should be paid out of the estate so embarked. Relief was given to the defendants, both in this court and by the court of errors and appeals; but the court of errors and appeals decided that the quantum of the estate so embarked was much less than that which this court adjudged the testator had embarked. Ferry v. Laible, 4 Stew. 566; S. C. on appeal, 5 Stew. 791.

The decree finally made in the suit adjudged the mortgaged premises, now sought to be condemned to sale for the payment of the complainant's mortgage, to be a part of the trade property, and directed that they should be sold for the payment of the trade debts. They were sold under that decree to the defendants on the first of March, 1881, and the defendants thus acquired an interest in the mortgaged premises which made them necessary parties to this suit.

The defendants have answered the complainant's bill. They admit the due execution of the mortgage on which the complainant's bill is founded, and say that it may be true that he is now the owner of the mortgage, but require him to prove his title. They also say that they have never had possession of the mortgaged premises, but that the premises were in possession of the complainant at the time they acquired their title to them, and have remained in his possession ever since; and that if he is the owner of the mortgage in question, he is a mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged premises, and as such is bound to account for their rental value. The defendants have also filed a cross bill, and it is the relief which they seek by this pleading which forms the subject of the present controversy.

The defendants by their cross bill make three distinct claims to relief. First, they say that the complainant, being a mortgagee in possession, must account for the rental value of the mortgaged premises; second, they say that John Laible died possessed of a large personal estate, sufficient to pay all his debts, including that of the complainant, and also seised of several tracts of land, which he empowered his executors to sell, and some of which they still hold, unsold; and that, inasmuch as there is a large balance still due to them on the decree which they obtained as creditors of the post mortem business; and that as the personal estate of a decedent is, by law, the primary fund for the payment of his debts, and that, inasmuch also as their debt was contracted pursuant to the direction of John Laible, and to enable his executors to carry out his principal testamentary scheme, their position in this litigation is invested with such strong and extraordinary equities that the court should, before condemning their property to sale for the payment of the complainant's debt, exhaust all other possible means of satisfying that debt, even if it should be necessary to go to the extent of compelling the executors to make good any loss which John Laible's estate has sustained in consequence of their wrongful acts or omissions; and third, they say that the complainant, in December, 1874, procured a large amount of the personal property embarked in the post mortem business, and which stood liable in equity for the payment of the trade debts, to be seized and sold under a judgment which he had previously recovered against Johanna Laible, who held possession of such property as one of the executors of John Laible, and also as one of the managers of the post mortem business, and at such sale purchased the property himself, and afterwards took possession of it and applied it to his own use; and thus, the defendants say, the complainant, without right or warrant of law, obtained over $9,000 worth of property which should, in equity, have been applied to the payment of the trade debts. The defendants claim that by force of these facts they are entitled to a decree in this suit, requiring the complainant to account for the value of the property so obtained by him, and that he be directed to pay the same, either to them or to the receiver already appointed in the suit which they brought to establish their rights as creditors of the post mortem business. The complainant moves to dismiss the cross bill, on the ground that its subject matters are so foreign to and distinct from the matter put in litigation by the original bill that they cannot be regarded as, in any sense, necessarily connected with or auxiliary to the subject matter of the original suit.

The defendants' right to have the complainant to account for the rental value of the mortgaged premises, during the time he has been in possession of them under his mortgage, is a pure matter of defense, and like other pure defenses should be interposed by answer. They have set it up in their answer, and as they can have the full benefit of it under that pleading, a cross bill is both useless and irregular.

The other claims to relief made by the cross bill, are, in my judgment, so entirely foreign to the cause of action upon which the complainant rests his right to relief, that the court must, both for considerations of justice and convenience, deny the defendants' right to litigate them in this suit. Whether a cross bill is filed for the purpose of enabling a defendant to make a defense more complete and effectual than he would be permitted to make if he stood on an answer alone, or for the purpose of enabling the court to do more complete justice to all parties, in respect to the matter put in litigation by the original bill, the rule is imperative that the new facts sought to be introduced by it must be so directly and closely connected with the cause of action set up in the original bill as to render the cross suit a mere auxiliary of the original suit, or a graft or dependency upon it. "A cross bill," says Cooper, "ex vi terminorum implies a bill brought by a de-defendant in a suit against the plaintiff, respecting the matter in question in that bill; and it is a weapon of defense in such case. But sometimes it is brought against the codefendants in such depending suit, where they have opposite claims, which the court cannot determine upon the bill already filed, and the determination of such clashing interests is still necessary to a complete decree upon the subject matter of the suit." Coopers' Eq. Pl. 85.

And Mitford says that where a cross bill is not filed as a means of defense, it is "a proceeding to procure a complete determination of a matter already in litigation." Mit. Eq. Pl. 76.

The new facts which it is proper for a defendant to introduce into a pending litigation, by means of a cross bill, are such, and such only, as it is necessary for the court to have before it, in deciding the questions raised in the original suit, to enable it to do full and complete justice to all the parties before it, in respect to the cause of action on which the complainant rests his right to aid or relief. If a defendant, in filing a cross bill, attempts to go beyond this, and to introduce new and distinct matter, not essential to the proper determination of the matter put in litigation by the original bill, although he may show a perfect case against either the complainant, or one or more of his codefendants, his pleading will not be a cross bill, but an original bill. Ayres v. Carter, 17 How. 591 [58 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 179]; Cross v. Del Valle, 1 Wall. 5 [68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 515]; Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 807 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 829]; Galatian v. Erwin, Hopk. 48.

The chancellor, in Carpenter v. Gray, 10 Stew. 389, held that a cross bill must be confined to the matter contained in the original bill, and that if a defendant attempts, by cross bill, to engraft on the litigation, introduced by the complainant's bill, questions not necessary to the proper determination of the complainant's right to relief, his bill must be dismissed.

It is obvious, I think, that if we try the pleading under consideration by these rules, it must be held to have been improperly filed, and should, therefore, be dismissed.

But, I think, this pleading is subject to a more formidable objection than that urged against it by the counsel of the complainant. According to my view, it presents no ground upon which any relief whatever can be given to the defendants.

The defendants are creditors of the post mortem business, and as such have a very limited remedy. They must look alone to the property embarked in the post mortem business for the payment of their debts. They have no right to or claim upon the testator's general estate. This is the well established rule.

Both this court and the court of errors and appeals have affirmed it whenever the defendants' rights, in this respect, have been presented for judgment. Ferry v. Laible, 12 C. E. Green, 146; S. C. 4 Stew. 566; S. C. on appeal, 5 Stew. 791.

The mortgaged premises, at the time they were embarked in the post mortem business, were subject to the complainant's mortgage; and hence, all that was embarked was the testator's equity of redemption, and this was all the defendants acquired when they took title to them. By their purchase they acquired a right to redeem the land from the debt for which it stood pledged, by paying the debt, but, having acquired merely an equity of redemption, and paid for that alone, and not the full value of the land, they stand without the least right to call upon the court to apply any other fund to the payment of the mortgage debt in exoneration of their estate. They took title to the land subject to the burden of the mortgage, and they must, therefore, either pay the mortgage themselves or suffer the land to be sold for its payment. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 567.

It is undoubtedly true that the personal estate of a decedent is the primary fund for the payment of his debts, and that an heir at law, or devisee, or widow, has a right to call upon the administrator or executor of the decedent to exonerate his land from a mortgage debt existing thereon, for which the decedent is personally liable, by paying the same out of the personal estate, but this right belongs alone to the three classes of persons just mentioned. An alienee or mortgagee of an heir or devisee has no such right. Keene v. Munn, 1 C. E. Green, 398; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 566.

It would seem, therefore, to be entirely clear that the defendants are without the least right in equity to have the complainant's debt cast upon the testator's general estate.

The defendants also say that the complainant in 1874, over eleven years ago, wrongfully possessed himself of over $9,000 of the trade property, and thus converted to his own use assets which should have been applied to the payment of the trade debts. The title to this property was in the executors. If the complainant obtained it wrongfully, the legal injury resulting was done to the executors. No wrong was done to the defendants. They had neither title to the property, nor a lien upon it. The executors, by acquiescence or participation in the wrongful acts of the complainant, may have rendered themselves personally liable to the defendants and the other creditors of the post mortem business for the value of the property so diverted or abstracted; but if so, it is manifest that that question forms no part of this litigation, and should not be examined or decided in this suit.

The cross bill must be dismissed, with costs.

George A. WRIGHT et al.

Twenty years' possession of the premises by a mortgagee, under his mortgage, pursuant to the eighteenth section of the Statute of Limitations, bars the mortgagor's equity of redemption, and the extinguishment of the mortgagor's equity effected by this Statute, unlike the extinguishment effected by mere judicial action, is not subject to be waived by an incautious admission of the mortgagee.

BILL to quiet title. On motion to strike out part of defendant's answer. Heard on notice given pursuant to page 215 of the Rules. Motion granted.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin A. Vail, for complainant, for motion.

Mr. Alan H. Strong, for defendants, contra.

Van Fleet, V.C., delivered the following opinion:

The complainant brings this suit to quiet her title to certain land. Her bill is filed under the Act of 1870. Rev. 1189. Instead of simply alleging that she is in peaceable possession of the land in question, as owner, she has given a full history of her title. It originated, as her bill states, in a mortgage made on the 21st day of June, 1830, by Lewis Wright and wife to Timothy Herbert, to secure the payment of $165 on the 21st day of June, 1831. The mortgage conveyed the fee. The mortgagee took possession of the mortgaged premises, under his mortgage, on the 30th day of April, 1836, and he, and his successors in title, have continued in possession ever since. Lewis Wright, the mortgagor, died intestate, about forty years ago. His heirs at law are the defendants to this suit. Four of them have appeared and answered, insisting that the land is still subject to their equity of redemption. Their claim in this regard rests upon the following facts: the complainant, on the 31st of October, 1885, made a contract to sell and convey the land, which contract required her, for the purpose of perfecting her title, to bring a suit, and obtain a decree of strict foreclosure against the heirs at law of the mortgagor. Such suit was subsequently brought, but was afterwards, on the 17th of March, 1886, and after the defendants had appeared to it, dismissed, on the complainant's own motion. The defendants insist that the institution of the suit to foreclose, taken in connection with the agreement making it the duty of the complainant to bring such suit, constituted such an admission of their right of redemption, as amounted to a conclusive waiver of any bar to such right which previously existed.

The complainant moves to strike out that part of the answer which asserts that the defendants still have a right to redeem, on the ground that the matters there alleged are impertinent and constitute no defense. On the admitted facts of the case, it is clear that the title which the complainant now holds was at one time subject to an equity of redemption, and it is equally certain that this equity was subsequently barred by lapse of time. The defendants admit that the person holding the mortgage executed in 1830, took possession, under his mortgage, of the land in question, in 1836, and that he and those who succeeded to his rights have continued in the uninterrupted possession of the land from that time up to October, 1885, a period of over forty-nine years; and that during the whole of this long period, neither the mortgagor nor those standing in his rights either exercised or attempted to exercise their right of redemption. They also admit that neither the mortgagee nor those standing in his rights did, at any time during the same period, do or say anything which, either directly or indirectly, admitted or recognized that the land was subject to an equity of redemption. These admissions render it perfectly clear that for a period of over twenty-nine years prior to the 31st of October, 1885, the equity which the defendants now claim stood wholly barred and extinguished; for it is a principle of equity jurisprudence authoritatively settled and universally recognized, that the laches and nonclaim of the rightful owner of an equitable estate, who is under no disability, and in a case free from fraud, for a period of twenty years, will, where the person in possession has held adversely to such owner, without in any way recognizing his right, constitute a conclusive bar to all right to equitable relief. In support of a principle so generally recognized, only a leading case or two need be cited. Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & Walk. 1; 8 C. on appeal, Id. 189; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 157 [28 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 291].

This principle applies in all its force to the equity of redemption of a mortgagor. Twenty years' possession by a mortgagee, of the mortgaged premises, under his mortgage, without accounting to the mortgagor for rents or profits or otherwise recognizing his mortgage as a subsisting lien, will, where the mortgagor is under no disability, bar his equity of redemption. Demarest v. Wynkoop, 8 Johns. Ch. 129; 2 Jones, Mort. § 1144; Angell, Lim. § 456.

Although there are but few statutes limiting the time within which equitable remedies must be enforced, yet courts of equity have, from the earliest times, given effect to lapse of time, as a bar to the remedies which they administer; and they, as a general rule, measure the period of laches or nonclaim which will be sufficient to bar an equitable action, by the period, fixed by the Statute of Limitations, for the extinguishment of a similar right of action at law. And as twenty years' adverse possession will bar a right of entry or an action of ejectment, courts of equity have, in analogy to the Statute of Limitations, adopted that as the period which shall be sufficient to bar an equity of redemption. This rule, however, is a mere judicial regulation; it is founded on the maxim, Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium; and, like other judicial rules, is subject to change, by the power which created it, whenever that course may seem necessary for the furtherance of justice. The courts have, accordingly, annexed to this rule the following important qualification: If a mortgagee in possession shall, after the equity of the mortgagor has become barred by lapse of time, admit, either by word or act, that his mortgage is still a subsisting lien, the bar previously existing will be considered to have been waived, and the equity of the mortgagor revived. 2 Jones, Mort. § 1163.

And an admission having this effect will be considered to have been made if the mortgagee institutes proceedings, either by suit or otherwise, to foreclose his mortgage; the reason assigned being that such act is entirely inconsistent with any pretension on his part that his possession had ripened into a title. 2 Jones, Mort. § 1170; Angell, Lim. § 458; Calkins v. Isbell, 20 N.Y. 147.

And it has also been held that an admission, entitled to like effect, may be made by the mortgagee's offering to purchase the mortgagor's equity of redemption. Angell, Lim. § 458.

Applying the rule as thus qualified to the case in hand, it would seem to be clear that the defendants are entitled to the protection they ask, unless the sufficiency of their defense is to be judged by some other rule, or the trial of the equity which they claim will necessarily involve the investigation of transactions occurring so long ago that it will be impossible for the court in consequence, either of the loss of evidence or of the very imperfect and indeterminate character of that to which resort must be had, to ascertain the truth concerning them with that degree of certainty which will enable it to do, at least, approximate justice. The latter alternative need not, however, be discussed, for, in my judgment, the question, whether or not the defendants are entitled to the equity which they claim, must be decided in conformity to the plain direction of a positive law. The eighteenth section of the Statute of Limitations declares: "That if a mortgagee, and those under him, be in possession of the lands, tenements and hereditaments contained in the mortgage, or any part thereof, for twenty years after default of payment by the mortgagor, then the right or equity of redemption of the mortgagor therein shall be forever barred." Rev. 597.

The regulation which this statute prescribes concerns a pure matter of equity. As between a mortgagee and a mortgagor, the legal title to the mortgaged premises is in the mortgagee. Originally, it will be remembered, the most rigorous principles of the common law, respecting estates granted on condition, were applied to mortgages, and it was, at one time, the settled law of England, that if a mortgagor did not pay the money secured by his mortgage, on the very day appointed for its payment, the land, by the mere force of his default, became vested absolutely in the mortgagee, freed from the condition; or in the words of the books, "the land was taken from him forever, and so was dead to him." 2 Coke, Litt. § 832, title Estates, 205a.

Now, however, according to the law of modern times, a mortgagor has a right, after condition broken, and at any time before his equity is lost by laches, to redeem the land which he has conveyed in pledge, by paying the mortgage debt. This right, however, is a pure equity, cognizable alone by courts of equity. A mortgagor can assert it in no other forum. This statute, then, was manifestly designed to regulate and limit an equitable remedy—to fix the period within which a mortgagor must, after his mortgagee has taken possession of the mortgaged premises, exercise his equity of redemption, or lose it—and courts of equity are, therefore, as much bound to respect it, and give effect to it, as they are to observe and enforce any other legislative mandate issued to them.

There can be no doubt that this statute binds this court, and that this court must take it as it finds it, and give effect to it, according to its plain words, adding nothing to it and taking nothing from it.

The statute is an old one, having been passed in 1799, and stands to day in the very words in which it was originally enacted. Patt. Laws, 354. Its meaning is so plain that its construction has never, so far as I can discover, been the subject of doubt or discussion. It says, as plainly as language can speak, that twenty years' possession by a mortgagee, under his mortgage, after the mortgagor has made default, shall bar the mortgagor's equity of redemption, and that when his equity is once extinguished in this way, it shall remain extinguished forever.

There is nothing in its words, and nothing in its spirit or purpose, which will justify even a suspicion that the Legislature which passed it intended that the bar which it created should, after it becomes complete—after the mortgagee's legal estate becomes perfect by being freed from the mortgagor's equity—still be subject to be waived, at least, by anything which the mortgagee might happen to do with intent to strengthen his title; on the contrary, I think it is evident that what was meant was that when the mortgagor's equity was once extinguished, it should remain absolutely blotted out forever. This, I think, was Chancellor Williamson's construction of it. He said in Bates v. Conrow, 3 Stock, 137, that twenty years' possession by a mortgagee, under his mortgage, by force of this statute, bars the mortgagor's equity of redemption; and he gave effect to this bar, in that case, regardless of the fact that an application had been made to the mortgagor, after the mortgagee had been in possession for over twenty years, to convey his interest in the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, to save the mortgagee the expense of a suit to foreclose his mortgage.

But whether my interpretation of this case is correct or not, one thing is certain: the law under consideration is a statute of repose, enacted in the interest of peace, and to promote the security and stability of titles to land by preventing litigation respecting stale claims. This being its obvious design, it would, in my judgment, be a direct violation of its most conspicuous purpose, to declare that a mortgagor might not only lie by for twenty years, after his mortgagee had taken possession of the mortgaged premises, and neglect for that period to assert his rights, but that he could also remain inactive for an additional period of twenty-nine years, and still be able (in case his mortgagee should subsequently by an incautious word or act seem to admit that the mortgage was still a subsisting lien) to successfully assert the equity which the statute plainly intended, on the lapse of twenty years, to utterly obliterate and destroy.

It may be proper to say a word respecting the position which the parties to this litigation occupy towards each other. The defendants seek to interpose their lost equity against a right claimed by the complainant. There can be no dispute that it is a principle of equity jurisprudence, of almost universal application, that he who asks equity must do equity; but this principle, in my judgment, has no application to this case, for, by the peremptory mandate of this statute, a mortgagor whose mortgagee has for twenty years been in possession of the mortgaged premises, under his mortgage, has no equity.

The lapse of that period of time, by force of the statute, extinguishes, absolutely and forever, all equitable right which he previously possessed. The defendants, therefore, have no equity to urge against the complainant.

The complainant's motion must be granted with costs.

IN THE MATTER OF the Alleged Lunacy of Mary S. PERRINE.

An inquisition, finding a deaf-mute to be "of sound mind and capable of controlling her property by the selection of a proper person to act for her," set aside; the proof being certified to be that she was incapable of understanding business or of receiving any communication on the subject.

(Decided August 24, 1886.)

ON motion to set aside inquisition. Granted. The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. S. Appelget, for the motion.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The inquisition in this case is signed by nineteen of the twenty-four jurors. They find that the alleged lunatic "is of sound mind and is capable of controlling her property by her own selection of a proper person to act for her." The other five certify that she is "not of sufficient understanding to enable her to manage her property." She is about sixty-five years old and has never been married. The commissioners have made a report concerning her condition. They say that she is not an idiot or lunatic in the popular sense of the words; that she has been a deaf-mute ever since she was two or three years old; that she is ignorant, having never been taught any language whether spoken or of signs; that she can neither read nor write and cannot express to others her understanding, if any she have, of any business transaction; that she cannot be made to comprehend a business transaction, except, perhaps, a very ordinary one involving no more money than a dollar or two; that she has learned to fetch and carry and do common, every-day housework; that is, she can sweep, wash, cook an ordinary meal, etc.; that it is possible by rude gestures to communicate to her a desire that she should do such work; that she has never managed her property nor any part thereof, and that the acting trustee of her estate has never informed her of the amount, character or income of her property, and that it is doubtful whether she can be so informed; that she has always been cared for by her near relatives with whom she has lived, by her mother for about fifty years and until her mother's death; after her mother's death by her unmarried sister so long as that sister lived, and since that sister's death by her married sister with whom she now lives.

Application is made to set aside the inquisition, on the ground that the finding is contrary to the evidence.

Lord Hale says that a man deaf and dumb from his birth is in presumption of law an idiot; and the rather because he has no possibility to understand what is forbidden by law to be done or under what penalties. He also says that if it can appear that the man has the use of understanding, which, he adds, many of that condition discover by signs to a very great measure, then he may be tried and suffer judgment and execution, though great caution is to be used therein. Hale, P. C. 34.

In Brover v. Fisher, 4 Johns. Ch. 441, Chancellor Kent said, speaking of such persons: "Perhaps, after all, the presumption in the first instance is, that every such person is incompetent. It is a reasonable presumption, in order to insure protection and prevent fraud, and is founded on the notorious fact that the want of hearing and speech exceedingly cramps the powers and limits the range of the mind. The failure of the organs requisite for general intercourse and communion with mankind oppresses the understanding. Affligat humo divina particulam aures. A special examination to repel the inference of mental imbecility seems always to have been required." A person born deaf and dumb but not blind, is not an idiot. Coll. Lun. 4, § 5; Shelf. Lun. 4; Brover v. Fisher, supra.

But in order to warrant this court in interfering in behalf of a person to protect him against the consequences of his own mental incompetency, it is not necessary that he should be an idiot or a lunatic; it is enough if from any cause, whether by age, disease, affliction or intemperance, he has become incapable of managing his own affairs. 2 Mad. Ch. 732; 1 Bl. Com. 304; Ridgway v. Darwin, 8 Ves. 65; Conover's Case, 1 Stew. Eq. 380; Lawrence's Case, Id. 331.

In Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 267, 273, Lord Eldon says that upon a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo it is not necessary to establish lunacy, but it is sufficient that the party is incapable of managing his own affairs.

It was so held by Chancellor Kent in the Matter of Barker, 2 Johns. Ch. 232, where the person who was the subject of the inquiry had become incapacitated by old age. Whether persons born deaf and dumb are to be treated judicially as persons mentally incompetent to manage their affairs must depend upon the evidence they are able to give of the possession of capacity.

In Dickenson v. Blisset, 1 Dick. 268, a person who was born deaf and dumb, and who had attained to her majority, applied for possession of her real estate and for an assignment to her of her personal property. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke having put questions to her in writing, to which she gave sensible answers in writing, thereupon granted the application. In Brover v. Fisher, 4 Johns. Ch. 441, above cited, a commission was issued to inquire as to the mental competency of such a person.

In the case in hand the jury found that Miss Perrine was of sound mind and capable of controlling her property by her own selection of a proper person to act for her. But if the proof was, as the commissioners certify, that she is incapable of understanding the business or even of receiving any communication upon the subject, and therefore does not understand and cannot be made to understand what the necessities of the management of her estate demand or what an agent is or what his duties are; or, in other words, if the proof was as they certify, that she does not understand and cannot be made to understand any matter of business except it may be such as are of the most simple character—if she has no comprehension of business matters—it is obvious that she is not capable of managing her affairs and the inquisition cannot be sustained. The jury does not find that she is herself competent to manage her business, but that she is capable of controlling it by an agent of her own selection. But if she cannot be made to understand what the business is, how can she select an agent to manage it?

The inquisition will be set aside.

Willard C. PARKER.

- *1. A street was opened and dedicated to the public use, after which one of the complainants purchased a portion of the land over which the street extended, taking a deed therefor with full covenants of warranty, and completely obstructed the street by making deep excavations for its road and by laying its tracks. Held, that the complainants are estopped from claiming that any portion of the said street was dedicated.
2. Afterwards, the surveyors made return of a public road over the same land, crossing the railroad of complainants, against the recording of which return the complainants filed a caveat, and prevailed; and then built a water tank twelve feet in diameter about in the center of the said proposed highway. Held, that this too works an estoppel.
3. When part of an alleged way is over a private alley way owned by two in common, the court will not declare the existence of such alleged way unless both the owners of the private way are before the court.
4. In such case the court would rather presume a license by the absent owner than to declare the use adverse, without his being heard.
5. To establish a by-road, from twenty years' uninterrupted adverse enjoyment, there must be a certain well defined line of travel in the same place over the entire route for all that time.

BILL for an injunction requiring the removal of certain obstructions to an alleged public highway. On bill, answer and proofs. Dismissal of bill advised.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. G. H. Large and Benj. Williamson, for complainants.

Messrs. H. A. Fluck, J. A. Bullock and J. N. Voorhees, for defendant.

BIRD, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

plaint and ask thereby for an injunction requiring the defendant to remove the posts and boards constituting a fence erected by him across what they claim to be a street, and also the dwelling house now being erected by him on a portion of said street, which they charge is a public street running to and from their tracks.

The complainants own a railroad running into the Village of Flemington, at which point they have passenger and freight depots. Prior to their purchase of the right of way, J. G. R. had opened a street over his land fifty feet wide, from the south end of the defendant's lot to Church Street, over lands which he afterwards conveyed to the Railroad Company; and had made one or more conveyances of parcels of his land adjoining on said street and described them as bounded thereon and thereby; showing an intention to dedicate so much of his land to the public use as had then been designated for that purpose by removing fences and fixing the boundaries by the erection of fences from the south end of defendant's lot.

It is alleged that it was the intention of J. G. R. to extend the said street northward over the lot now owned by the defendant to Mine Street; but he did not do so, as the proof shows, at the time he opened it from the south end of said lot. But it is clear that the street had been opened and a conveyance made calling for it as a street before the Railroad Companies took their title.

It is an important fact that the Railroad Companies accepted a deed from J. G. R. for the right of way across this street, with full covenants of warranty. It is likewise important that they at once made a cut through said street and laid their tracks across it. It is admitted that these tracks completely obstructed the travel over the alleged street. In July, 1864, the Companies commenced running their trains and their patrons delivered to them their produce as freight. It is insisted that many of them used the lot now owned by the defendant, in passing to and from the depot of the complainants, with their horses and wagons.

In the year 1884 the defendant became the owner, as tenant in common, of the lot over which the way in dispute is said to have been acquired. In 1885 he became the owner of the entire fee and very soon thereafter erected a fence on the south end thereof, and also commenced the construction of a house which was inclosed, roofed and plastered at the time of the filing of the bill. These are the structures upon the lot of the defendant which the complainants pray this court to compel the defendant to remove.

In brief, then, the complainants claim that J. G. R. dedicated a strip of land running north and south from Mine Street to Church Street and opened it as a street, including therein the lot now owned by the defendant at the northern end thereof, and that he made conveyances calling for a street thereon; and that after the construction of their road, all that portion of the said street south of their road was abandoned; but they insist that all that portion north, not only to the defendant's lot, to which place J. G. R. had opened it as a street, but also all of the defendant's lot was used by the patrons of the railroad as they pleased.

Another important fact should be noted; that is that J. G. R. never was the sole owner in fee of the defendant's lot but held it in common with another. They purchased it in 1860. But the complainants urged that the work of dedication was never the less complete because it was immediately thrown open as part of said street; and that if it was not so thrown open, then there has been an uninterrupted adverse user for more than twenty years.

Still another fact must not be lost sight of; that is that when J. G. R. and his cotenant acquired the title to the defendant's lot in 1860 there was secured, by deed, a right to an open alley way, twelve feet wide, over this and the adjoining lot on the east, to which easement each lot contributed one half.

It is important also to bear in mind that within a period of twenty years, application was made for the appointment of surveyors to lay out this very strip of land, all the way from Mine Street over the lands of the defendant and of the complainants, crossing their tracks of course, and over the lands of J. G. R. to Church Street. It is admitted that the surveyors were appointed and made a return, laying out a public road over the alleged street. But the Railroad Companies filed a caveat against recording the return and succeeded. Immediately afterwards they erected a water tank ten or twelve feet in diameter, about in the center of what they claim J. G. R. intended as a public street, and also of what the surveyors returned as a public road.

Two questions are presented: first, was there an act of dedication, which included the lot of the defendant, of which the complainants can take advantage? Second, if not such dedication, has there been an uninterrupted adverse user of the whole of the defendant's lot as a public street, or of any certain and well defined portion of it, for over twenty years?

First; the complainants can claim nothing by any covenants, references or descriptions under which they have title to the lands covered by the alleged street or adjoining the same. The contrary thereof, rather, is the effect of this deed with its full covenants of warranty. By the acceptance of such a deed they ignore or repudiate the existence of a street which they now claim had before that time been solemnly dedicated to public use, and with reference to which private individuals had made purchases. Not only this; but the railroad, as has been said, was so constructed as to render the use of the street impossible. Still more than this; when the public in a formal manner, according to law, appealed to the courts to have this street made a public highway beyond a peradventure, and it is declared by the public authorities to be necessary to open it as a highway, the Railroad Companies not only resisted it so as to defeat the public desire, but at once erected a water tank in the proposed way, a substantial and permanent structure, and an effectual barrier to the use of the land as a street. And this tank stands on the north side of the tracks of the complainants' road, and on the very land which by their bill they claim was dedicated to the public by J. G. R.

Would it be equitable for the court to allow the complainants to destroy or obstruct so much of this street as may suit their convenience, and claim the benefit of the residue under the original act of dedication as against all the world? In other words, do the complainants come into court with clean hands and are they entitled to a favorable hearing? I think not. I conclude that the complainants, having by their deed accepted a conveyance of the fee of the land over which the way is alleged to have been dedicated, and having obstructed such way, by the construction of their roads and the erection of a water tank within the limits of such way, they are estopped from calling upon a court of equity to declare that the balance of said street was dedicated to public use, and from asking the aid of such court to enjoin others from obstructing it.

I say the complainants are estopped. I speak only with reference to them. I make no mention of the rights of others either at law or in equity.

But in case I am in error in the foregoing conclusion and notwithstanding it appears that part of the way has been effectually obstructed and destroyed by the complainants, has the allegation that the other portion of the alleged way was dedicated been sustained? In my judgment it has not. It is very certain that when J. G. R. opened the street from the rear of the Parker lot, he did not remove the fence from the rear of said Parker lot.

C. K. J., a highly credible witness who helped to measure the width of the street and saw the lateral fences erected and the cross fences taken up, says the fence on the Parker lot was not disturbed. I can see no reason to doubt his statement. It is true that J. W. says he was in the employ of J. G. R. and removed the fence in the rear of the Parker lot in the year 1860 or 1864 or 1865; but his testimony was not so clear nor so distinct as that of C. K. J. Besides, C. K. J. says, and he is not contradicted, that J. W. assisted in removing the other cross fences, by which he may most honestly conclude at this distant period that his work included the other also. There is also much other testimony to sustain C. K. J.

First, J. G. R. was not the sole owner of the fee of the Parker lot in 1860. He and S. E. purchased it that year, as tenants in common; and there is no pretense that S. E. ever intended to dedicate it to public use. S. E. continued the owner of the undivided one half until 1871. This of itself is conclusive against the assertion of dedication in 1860.

Second, very many witnesses who had excellent opportunities for knowing, sustain C. K. J. They give circumstances or incidents, such as repeatedly climbing over the fence in going to and from school and in going to and from their play at ball and to and from their neighbors when visiting, and falling off from it after the year 1867, with such detail as to exclude all reasonable doubt of the correctness of their statements, whether we consider the events themselves or the times of their occurrence.

One witness says that while resting from ball playing he was sitting on this fence and when he went to get off, he fell and cut his forehead so badly that the aid of a surgeon was required, and he still carries the scar. Another, in going on an errand for a sick lady, let a bottle of medicine fall, which she thought had broken it. She remarked about it to the sick lady, who said she wished it had broken. Such incidents strengthen the direct assertion.

Therefore, it is very plain J. G. K. did not, in the year 1860, as is alleged, remove the fence in the rear of the Parker lot and thereby dedicate said lot to public use. And there has been no effort to show that he did so afterwards.

But the complainants allege that, independent of any act of dedication, the public have enjoyed such an uninterrupted adverse use of this alleged street for twenty years as to secure to the complainants all the benefits of a public highway.

At the very outset I may say that it seems to me to be impossible for any considerate person to adjudge that all of the Parker lot has been subjected to any such uninterrupted adverse enjoyment. For, to say nothing about the fence on the south end thereof, it has been so plainly proved that there was a fence on the north end of it, for many years within the statutory limit, except over six feet of a twelve foot alley way, that I need not stop for one moment to balance the testimony. So that if there has been a way established, by an uninterrupted adverse user, it must be limited to a very narrow portion of the north end of the lot. And since all the rest of the lot at that end was inclosed by a fence, if a way does exist it must be confined to the said alley way in entering upon the Parker lot.

At this point a serious hindrance presents itself; so far as the proof extends, all the use of the Parker lot, whether more or less, was gained by entering at the alley way named. That alley way was a private alley way, intended for the benefit and enjoyment of the owner of the Parker lot and the lot adjoining it on the east. By express stipulation it was to be an open alley way. Both lots were at one time owned by the same person, and when he conveyed the Parker lot, he secured to each said alley, in width twelve feet, imposing one half on each.

Now, I remark, that if a way of any kind has been proved, it must in part be over this private right of way or alley. And the hindrance referred to is the absence of the owner of the one half of the alley way, from these proceedings. He has not been brought into court. As the facts are, how can I advise a decree against him? Or how can I advise a decree which will be ineffectual unless it be against him? No consideration of the case has been presented to me which overcomes this difficulty.

But if it be said that the use being proved, the presumption is either an acquiescence or a grant, still, he has a right to be heard. If any presumption arises, it would be as fair to presume that the persons using the way did so by the license, merely, of the other joint owner; or did so when in or about his business. See Washb. Easms. *133, *143, *144; Brinck v. Collier, 56 Mo. 160; Hemingway v. Chicago, 60 Ill. 324; Hall v. McLeod, 2 Met. (Ky.) 98.

Passing on I do not find a twenty years' adverse user in a legal sense. If the witnesses referred to already be believed, the south end of the Parker lot was obstructed by a post and rail fence as late as 1899, and if two other most reputable witnesses be believed, later still they encountered obstructions at different times which hindered them from entering upon said lot from the south.

There were gates at the northern end of the alley way, and a great deal of time was spent in an effort on the one side to show that they were closed within the twenty years, and on the other that they were not. If the latter, I do not see that any inference follows, since by deed the alley was to be an open one. Of course if closed, the act of closing would be a denial of the public right and a prevention of the operation of the statute. There does not seem to be any doubt but that one or both of the gates was or were closed within twenty years.

Again; it is urged that twenty-eight witnesses, called by the complainants, have sworn to the use of this alley way and this Parker lot ever since the construction of the railroad in 1864. Certainly, a large number of these witnesses swear that they used this alley way and this lot from the period named, whenever they had occasion to do so, without interruption. I believe them. One witness is contradicted. Another says he often opened the gates for him. It is not necessary that I should attempt to settle or harmonize this difference. Suffice it to say that a great many witnesses passed in and out of this gate way at different times.

The material questions are, on this head: Where did they make their exit from the lot and enter upon it at the end opposite the gates? And also, where did they travel after passing the gate way in reaching the other end? These important questions have not been settled by the proof offered. There is nothing which shows a well defined line of travel at the south end of the lot for twenty years.

As I have stated, the proof satisfies me that there has been a post and rail fence across that end of the lot within twenty years. What then? Are all these witnesses called by the complainants to be discredited? Not at all, for there was a way to reach the depot, the place to which they were going, without going over the south line of the Parker lot. That lot was only fifty feet wide. A portion of the lot adjoining on the west was unfenced, both on the east and south lines. This is the proof. One witness swears to it very clearly, and the owner of the lot says that when he fenced his lot on the east side in 1876 he also put a fence on the south line. Now it was easy enough for those who went to that depot to pass around the west end of the fence on the Parker lot and not cross the south line at all. Especially may this view be taken, when it appears by all the proof that there was a way greatly traveled for several years over that part of the said lot west of the Parker lot, which way led directly to the depot. And yet, while this view reconciles what otherwise seems to be in hopeless contradiction, there is not a single witness who testifies that the travel took any such route.

Therefore, it is only left for me to consider whether or not there was a well defined way over the Parker lot for over twenty years. This branch of the case is also, as I think, against the complainants. No one, however skillful, could take the testimony and from it lay a road and say that it had been traveled in that particular line for twenty years.

One witness says they went up the alley way to the tie post and then broke off and went as they pleased. Another says they went half way up the alley way, which would be perhaps a hundred feet further than the tie post, and then went across the Parker lot. Another says he would go up the alley way to the barn and then out to the railroad grounds. Another says: we drove anywhere, just where we could find the best road. Another says he didn't remember going any other way than going up the straight line, which would be up the alley way. He said he used to cart ties up there and wood also, and went up the straight line. When afterwards pressed by the complainants' counsel, he said he went in at the corner, meaning the alley way, "and when we got in we went pretty much as we pleased." And still another witness said: "We didn't always go in one place. An apple tree stood there but I can't tell on which side we drove."

Manifestly, if the complainants' witnesses cannot more clearly define the alleged way it would seem to be quite useless for the court to declare that there has been one in any given place for over twenty years. It might be safe for me to say that there has been some travel over the lot in question somewhere, but precisely where I cannot tell, and this I regard as absolutely essential. He who claims an easement over the land of another, by the uninterrupted adverse enjoyment thereof for over twenty years, must show that such adverse enjoyment has been in the same place for the period of time required.

The complainants' bill should be dismissed, with costs; and I shall so advise.

v.

Frederick K. DAY.

Dower does not attach, either at common law or under N. J. Rev. p. 320, to real estate of which the husband was seised in joint tenancy.

(Decided July 14, 1886.)

BILL for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. On general demurrer. Overruled.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward A. & William T. Day, for demurrant:

There is no essential quality in a joint estate necessarily incompatible with the existence of an inchoate dower interest; and by analogy to the cases of estates determinable by condition or by title paramount it would seem perfectly consistent with principle to hold that the right of dower attaches upon such estate, subject only to be defeated by the survivorship of the cotenant of the husband.

1 Scrib. Dower, chaps. 16, 92.

The doctrine of the common law is exceptional in its character and one for which no good reason is apparent. An absurd consequence resulting from the rule is that if the husband sever the joint estate by conveying his share to a third person, the right of dower of his wife is thereby entirely defeated; while by the same act the right of dower of the wife of his cotenant and of the third person at once attaches.

1 Scrib. Dower, chaps. 16, 93.

Messrs. Babbitt & Lawrence, for complainants:

At common law there was no dower in an estate held in joint tenancy.

1 Scrib. Dower, 257, 321 et seq. and cases cited; 1 Washb. R. P. *156; Wms. R. P. 215; Hill. R. P. 3d ed. 580; 4 Kent, Com. 37; Maybury v. Brien, 15 Pet. 21 (40 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 646).

If the joint estate was severed by the alienation of the husband, the right of dower was thereby entirely defeated. The dower Act, Rev. p. 320, does not change the rule.

In 2 Greenl. Cruise, R. P. 375, the reason of the rule is stated as follows: "The widow of a joint tenant in fee or in tail is not entitled to dower, because upon the death of her husband the estate goes to the other joint tenant who is then in from the first feoffor or donor and may plead such feoffment or gift as originally made to himself without naming his companion."

The possibility that the estate of each joint tenant may be defeated by his dying in the lifetime of the other prevents the right of dower attaching.

1 Greenl. R. P. 156. See also 4 Kent, Com. 37.

In the case of Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, it is held that there is no dower in an estate in joint tenancy.

Ranyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of real estate by the complainants to the defendant. The objection made to the title is that the wives of the complainants' grantors, who held the title as joint tenants in fee, did not join in the conveyance to the complainants; and it is urged that the wives, who are living, may have a right of dower in the property. By the common law no title of dower attaches where the husband is seised of the land jointly with another or others. This is owing to the nature of the estate of joint tenants. The possibility, so long as the joint ownership subsists, that the estate of each tenant may be wholly defeated by his dying in the lifetime of the other or others prevents the attaching of the right of dower in the wives of any of the tenants except the survivor. The estate which the husband must have to entitle his wife to dower is one in severalty or in common. The unity of interest in joint tenancies (each tenant is seised per my et per tout) prevents the admission of a right of dower or curtesy, except as to the estate of the survivor. On the decease of one joint tenant the survivor holds the whole property under and by virtue of the original grant, and holds no part of it in anywise under the decedent. 2 Cru. Dig. 444.

We have not in this State changed the law in respect to dower in such estates, either by statute or legal adjudication. The statute, it is true, provides that the wife shall have dower in all the real estate of which her husband or any other to his use was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the coverture, to which she shall not have relinquished her right of dower by deed duly executed and ac-knownledge (Rev. p. 820); and an estate in joint tenancy is in terms an estate of inheritance, but the right of survivorship in such estates has not been abolished. Such estates are recognized by statute (Rev. p. 167, § 78) and they retain their common-law characteristics. By the term "estate of inheritance" in the statute is meant an estate of inheritance in severalty or in common. Estates in joint tenancy are not included.

The demurrer will be overruled.

(Filed September 3, 1886.)

BILL for an accounting. Decree advised.
The facts are fully stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. H. Vredenburg, for complainant.

Mr. Chas. Haight, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions: In March, 1884, Mrs. Parker died leaving two sons, James and Henry, and leaving a large estate valued at over $80,000, nearly all of which was in stocks, bonds, mortgages and other securities. She made her home with James, but confided nearly all of her estate to the care and custody of Henry, trusting him to make investments for her. In no other respect did she manifest any preference. The proof shows that she was quite careful to avoid any act which would benefit the one son more than the other. If she made purchases for one she would for the other, or give an equivalent. She purchased a barrel of sugar for James and gave Henry cash equal to the cost of the sugar.

Soon after the death of the mother, Henry and James met to make division between themselves of her estate. They divided part but not all of it. Since then a dispute has arisen between them as to the amount of the estate in Henry's hands. Henry held ten American Dock & Improvement Company bonds valued at $1,000 each. James insists that they all belonged to his mother. Henry claims five of them as his own and says he paid for them with his own money. James insists that Henry was indebted to his mother at the time of her death in the sum of $14,800, in addition to the sum of $9,800. Henry denies the former charge, but admits owing $9,800. In June, 1888, about nine months before her death, the mother gave to Henry her own check for $7,000. This James says he should account for. Henry claims it as a gift.

First, as to the bonds. Henry says in his answer that in the months of March and April, 1888, at the request of his mother, he had the cashier of the Freehold National Banking Company purchase five $1,000 bonds of the American Dock & Improvement Company for his mother, which the cashier did, and says he delivered the bonds to his mother. In this he is sustained by testimony other than his own. His statement is corroborated by her bank account.

Henry swears that the other five shares were his own and that he purchased them with his own money. On this point I think his testimony is admissible. His bank book shows that in April, 1882, he was charged $4,856.25 for bonds. He collected the dividends on these five bonds and was credited therewith in his account at the bank. The testimony so far as considered decidedly sustains Henry; but very strong doubt is thrown over this branch of the case by what Henry himself did after the death of his mother, when the brothers met and made partial distribution. James asked Henry to make a statement of the assets in his hands, which Henry did. In that statement he includes "American Dock Bonds, $6,000." The bonds being valued at $1,000 each, this gives to the estate six bonds instead of five. That this was not an oversight in Henry is apparent from the fact that he appends to his former statement the items which had been distributed between them, and charges James with "American Dock bonds, $3,000," and adds: "Not divided yet and due the estate of S. G. Parker," six items, one of $6,000, one of $250, one of $9,800, one of $170.50, and one in these words and figures: "Dock stock ten shares, par value $1,000."

In addition, James swears that Henry produced ten bonds when they met for distribution and said they belonged to his mother, and passed over to him (James) five of them, and said that they were good. He says that after they had talked awhile Henry remarked: "I guess you had better hand a couple of those bonds back to me, as I haven't looked on the bank book lately." He handed back to Henry two of them, and afterwards inquired of him about it, when Henry said his mother had only six bonds.

Henry denies making any such statement to James. I cannot but remark that if James' statement is false, in the main it is a singular concoction. Henry admits, however, that he produced ten bonds with the securities which belonged to his mother, and that they were all placed upon the table, and that five of them were passed to James.

Now, notwithstanding Henry's emphatic statement under oath and the entries in his bank book, I am impressed with the belief that there must have been some transaction between himself and his mother by which these bonds became hers before her death. In the first place, it appears from his own showing that these five bonds which he claims as his own were kept with his mother's bonds and her other securities; and that when he produced such securities to make distribution thereof between himself and his brother, he also produced these five bonds which he now claims. In the next place, there must have been serious doubt in his mind about it, or he would not have charged James in his statement of the assets distributed, with the three bonds, without charging himself with the other two, which he did not do, although he retained them in his possession and charged himself with all the other items which he took in the division. His statement shows this fact.

These undisputed facts are proof of the assertion that his mind was in doubt, and sustain the testimony of James when he says that Henry expressed doubts and asked to have two bonds returned and said he had not looked over the bank book in some time. And in the third place is the entry in Henry's statement, which he furnished to James, after first making a general statement of the whole estate, in which only six bonds were mentioned, and then a further statement following, in which he charges James with what had been passed over to him and charges himself with what he had retained in the division, he makes this additional statement: "Dock stock, ten shares, par value $1,000;" besides which on the margin is written these words: "Not divided yet and due the estate of S. G. Parker."

If Henry was the bona fide owner of five of these bonds, I find myself wholly unable to reconcile such ownership with the three considerations just presented. It should be further considered that the bonds which Henry says he purchased as his own were purchased April 6, 1882, and that only about two years expired before he and his brother met to make the division; and that he had made the purchase of the five bonds, which he admits belonged to his mother, only about a year before they met to make such division. With these transactions so distinct and occurring so recently, I cannot understand how there could have been any doubt in Henry's mind nor why he should make the statement that he did, if five of those bonds were his.

I have endeavored to reconcile these circumstances with the testimony given by Henry and to conclude that these bonds belong to him as he swears they do, but I cannot. Henry appeared upon the witness stand as a fair and honest witness. I was favorably impressed with his manner. Nothing was presented to awaken discredit. It is only fair that I should say as much of James. Under such circumstances what is the duty of the court? Fortunately long experience has established safe rules.

First, it is well established that courts must be governed by the preponderance of testimony. Therefore, although the brothers may be said to be equally interested, yet all the other facts and circumstances above alluded to seem to give the greater weight on the side of the complainant.

And in the second place it must be considered, because it has also been long and well established, that Henry was trustee to some extent, or agent for his mother, and had the care and custody of her estate, and as such is held to a strict account. As such the burden is upon him; it was for him to make clear and plain, and to remove every reasonable doubt as to the ownership of these securities.

Consider next the claim of James, that Henry owes the estate $14,800, besides the note of $9,800. James says that some time prior to his mother's death he called on Henry and had an interview with him, respecting his mother's securities; and spoke of the impropriety of Henry's holding the notes which he had given to his mother, and that upon that occasion Henry produced three notes drawn by himself, one for $5,800, one for $2,500 and one for $6,000. He says that Henry retained these notes. It will be observed that these sums aggregate $14,800, the amount which James claims is now due, in addition to the $9,800.

As I understand James' testimony, he got the impression, at the time of the interview with Henry before their mother's death, that Henry said he owed $14,800; and from that fact and other circumstances seems to have the conviction that that indebtedness remains as well as the $9,800. Henry admits that at the time of that interview he did owe his mother $14,800, but says that afterwards he had a settlement with his mother which included the three notes; and that he gave her a note for the amount found to be due her at that time, which was $800. This note bears date July 1, 1882. The mother was present at that interview and so far as appears did not question anything that Henry may have said.

Independent of Henry's testimony, I am not able to conclude that he should be charged, according to the prayer of the bill, with $14,800 and $9,800. It is true he produced notes aggregating the former amount, when he and James met; and while he does not now produce the same identical notes, he admits a liability of $15,800. I am aware of the force of the insistence that Henry was holding the securities of his mother, among which were these notes which he had given her, which created obligations on his part toward his mother of a fiduciary nature; yet I can see no reason for charging Henry with the destruction of the two notes (one for $5,800 and one for $2,500), since a larger amount of indebtedness remains and may fairly be supposed to be included in the $9,800 note. I am entirely satisfied that on this point there is nothing more due the estate than the $9,800 and the $6,000.

Consider, in the last place, the alleged gift of $7,000 to Henry. A check is produced in which the blanks are filled in by Henry, dated June 25, 1888, signed by his mother, for $7,000. The last charge in her bank book shows that this went into her account. Can this be sustained as a gift? The mother was then seventy-six years of age, declining somewhat at least in physical and mental strength. She died the next March. The physician produced said that he was called to visit her prior to and subsequent to the date of the check. He swears that her brain was paralyzed to a certain extent. He says that he saw symptoms of this several months before her death. I am satisfied, however, that Mrs. Parker was a woman of great vigor of intellect, retaining her faculties of thought and action to a great degree, excepting only so far as indicated by the physician. Nevertheless, I must consider the fact that she was an aged woman and the mother of Henry, in whom she had unbounded confidence.

This confidence is particularly striking in that she not only trusted him with her securities, evidences of indebtedness by others, but the securities also which Henry had given, showing his indebtedness to her to the amount of $15,800. I have no doubt, from the testimony and from what I have seen of Henry upon the witness stand, that, to his mother, he was a prepossessing son, and that his influence over her was very great indeed, and that too without any special effort upon his part.

These things being so, such confidential relations existing, the burden of proof is on Henry who claims the benefit of the gift. He has the money, it is true, and shows the formal way by which it passed to his credit. There he rests his case. Does this bring him within the rule of law and save him from accounting for the $7,000?

I think Henry is obliged to account for the $7,000. This view seems to be sustained by all the authorities.

*Mr. E. as solicitor agreed with Mrs. C. to defend certain suits, for which she agreed to give him half of all the property or money that should be recovered. The defense entered failed, and the property was all recovered from Mrs. C. by judgment; Mr. E. procured Mrs. C. to execute and deliver to him a deed for one half of other property which she owned, without question, representing to her that it was for his compensation under the agreement. Held, that such deed is fraudulent and void, both in law and in fact.

(Filed September 9, 1886.)

BILL to have a deed set aside as fraudulent and void. Decree in accordance with prayer of bill advised.

The facts are stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. F. Frambach, Jr., for complainant.

Mr. S. B. Ransom, for defendant.

BIRD, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The complainant asks to have a deed, which she made and delivered to the defendant for the undivided one half interest in two lots of land, set aside as fraudulent and void. Although she denies all knowledge of executing this deed, she no doubt did so. Her claim is also that fraud and deception were practiced upon her by the defendant. She obtained her title to these lots by devise from Mr. Cox, whom she claimed to have been her husband. Mr. Cox died in 1878, leaving a will devising to her these lands, and also leaving other lands. The will was admitted to probate, thus perfecting her title. She claimed that she was entitled to dower as widow in the lands not devised. To dispose of this claim and to free the estate from embarrassment, the executor filed a bill against her.

*Head note by BIRD, V. C.

The defendant is an attorney at law and one of the solicitors at this court. Mrs. C. employed E., the defendant, to defend the suit brought by the executor. He entered into an agreement in writing with her, that for his services for defending said suit she should give him "one half of all sums of money recovered from the estate of Mr. Cox, deceased, either by suit or compromise."

Mrs. C. was in possession of a house and lot, not one of those devised, and an action in ejectment was commenced against her to recover the possession. An opinion was pronounced in the suit in chancery, in the October Term, 1884, adverse to Mrs. Cox; and although it does not appear definitely, yet about that time judgment was recovered against her in the action of ejectment. These events and dates are given for the purpose of adding and connecting therewith the fact that November 17, 1884, a very formal agreement in writing was entered into by Mrs. Cox and Mr. E., in which it is recited that "there is now a suit or suits at issue and pending," etc., and in consideration of $1 and of E.'s maintaining and defending said suits or any other which might thereafter be brought in reference to the rights of Mrs. Cox, the said Mrs. Cox "covenants and agrees to and with the said Anthony Englebrecht that the said Anthony Englebrecht shall receive as compensation for said services one half of the properties or moneys so recovered or received in the said suits." Care was taken to have a master in chancery present to have them acknowledge the execution of this agreement.

On the fourth day of the next February (1885), Mr. E. sent for Mrs. Cox to come to his office. There, in the presence of another attorney at law, a long conversation ensued respecting the suits which had been determined against Mrs. Cox and respecting the propriety of an appeal. I think both solicitors agree that there was a great deal of intercourse upon that occasion between them and Mrs. Cox upon these subjects. They agree that an appeal was not at all advisable. But they say that then and there the deed in question was presented to Mrs. Cox; that it was read over to her twice and explained to her.

It is admitted that the lands described in the deed were never the subject matter in dispute or litigation, and there is no sort of claim or pretense that they were included or intended in any sense to be included within either said agreements respecting compensation.

Mrs. Cox is a woman of ordinary natural capacity, but can neither read nor write and is extremely ignorant of all matters of business. There is no proof that she ever had the slightest experience or the remotest opportunity of knowing anything about the titles of real estate.

The other solicitor, who was present and took the acknowledgment of the deed, says that he read the deed to her and explained its contents. It also appears that he had some interest in the suits, for he argued the one on final hearing before the chancellor, for which he has had no compensation; and avoided answering the question as to compensation in the future, by saying that Mr. E. was under personal obligations to him.

At the time of the execution and delivery of the deed, in February, 1885, the estate of Mr. Cox was not settled, the accounts of the executor not yet having passed. Mrs. Cox's children were interested in these accounts and she was doing what she could in their behalf. Mr. E. continued to correspond with her respecting the accounts, and invited her to come to his office. According to his statements she was there in June, September and November, and perhaps at other times; but at the times named, he says he spoke to her about his interest in these lands and told her that he intended to file a bill for partition. He says that at none of these interviews did she deny having executed the deed nor in any way question his right to an interest in the land.

Let us go back to the time when the deed was executed. When Mrs. Cox went to the office of Mr. E., the deed was all prepared for execution. It was prepared by the master who took the acknowledgment and who, as counsel, had argued the cause before the chancellor. It was prepared at the request of Mr. E. Mrs. Cox had not given any directions about it nor had she been consulted. She had no knowledge of it until it was about to be presented to her for execution. Mrs. Cox says that she heard nothing more of it from that day until she learned that she had in fact executed a deed for this property from Mr. Brown, who told her that she had and that he had seen the deed, and also told her that she had better employ some good lawyer. I do not think it is at all material to determine whether or not Mr. E. did speak to Mrs. Cox at different times before he filed his bill for partition in November, 1885, after which occurred the interview with Mr. Brown. I say it is not material, because he was still acting as her counsel in respect to the accounts of the executor; and she was under the same influence that she is presumed to have been when she executed the deed. The whole transaction shows that, until the filing of the bill for partition, she had unbounded confidence in Mr. E.

But the defense must fall, upon the testimony of Mr. E. himself. He says that when the deed was executed "I explained to her that it was my compensation for services under the agreement." I do not see how he could make such a statement to his client. It certainly was not true in any sense. By the agreement he was to have the one half of all that was recovered; but nothing was recovered. And the property mentioned in the deed and conveyed thereby was not by any possibility involved in the controversy.

I must pronounce that the transaction complained of was not only fraudulent in law, but in fact. Mr. E. makes it so plain that he deceived and misled Mrs. Cox that every consideration of duty requires me to say so.

Mr. E. is an attorney at law and a solicitor in this court. The courts have given him a certificate of good character, and upon this clients rely, as they have a right to. The courts, then, when called upon, must see to it that the high trust implied is not abused. The courts must meet this responsibility in a becoming spirit of firmness, or share in the odium and dishonor which is sure to follow. The reputation of both bench and bar, before an enlightened world, is so involved that nothing will save it from just reproach but the most rigid scrutiny and most exacting rules.

I will advise a decree declaring that the said deed is void and that Mr. E. execute to Mrs. Cox such a deed as she delivered to him. The complainant is entitled to costs.

GROW.

1. Where one accepts work done under a contract, and recovers judgment at law for damages for breach of the contract, because of inferiority in quality of the article contracted for and delivered, he cannot insist, in a suit in this court, that the note given by him in payment for the article be annulled and surrendered, without crediting defendant with the balance due thereon.
2. In such a suit this court should decree that defendant surrender the note to plaintiff, and that plaintiff credit the amount still due on the note, upon his judgment recovered against defendant.

BILL to have a certain note declared null and void. Surrender of note advised.

The facts are stated by the Vice Chancellor. See also Crandall v. Grow, 3 Cent. Rep. 506. Mr. J. J. Crandall, complainant, pro se. Mr. D. J. Pancoast, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion: These parties entered into an agreement under which G. was to print a book for C. for the consideration of $1 per page for the larger, and $1.50 for the smaller type; each form to be paid for as it came off the press.

C. alleges in his bill that G. did not perform the contract in its terms and spirit, and that he brought suit against him because the book was printed upon an inferior quality of paper and because he did not print the book in a workmanlike manner; and recovered judgment in the court of law for $300. C. sets up in his bill that G. holds his promissory note for $250 "and that the only and sole consideration in and for said note is a balance of about $180 intended for the printing of said book according to contract."

The bill further alleges that said note is void in the hands of G. and prays for an injunction restraining him from transferring said note, and for an order requiring him to surrender it to C. The injunction was allowed [3 Cent. Rep. 506].

And now upon final hearing the question is, whether or not the note shall be declared void in the hands of G. and he be compelled to surrender it to C. without having credit for the amount still due upon it on the judgment which C. recovered against G.

C. insists that he is entitled to the benefit of the verdict of the jury which gave him $300 by way of damages for breaches of the contract, and also to have the note surrendered to him as void, and to keep the book which was printed by G. and delivered to C. In other words, it is urged that C. is entitled to all he had received directly from G., or all that he may yet receive through the verdict of the jury, without the least liability on his part to pay for so much of the work as he has received and appropriated to his own use. To sustain this view reference is made to Ellis v. Hamlen, 8 Taunt. 52; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 184; Cutler v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320; 2 Dutch, 290; School Trustees v. Bennett, 8 Dutch, 517; Beltinger v. Craigue, 31 Barb. 535; Davis v. Tallcot, 12 N. Y. 189; Gates v. Preston, 41 N. Y. 118; Blair v. Bartlett, 75 N. Y. 152; Dunham v. Bower, 77 N. Y. 80.

I think that we will get at the right view of this case, if we consider that the complainant is in a court of equity asking relief, and take for our standard the maxim that "He who asks equity must do equity." In this case C. has accepted the book, and has recovered a verdict of $300 for the unfaithful performance of the contract, and he now comes and insists that this court shall give him $180, or about that sum, in addition. I can see no reason for taking any such step in this case, after what the jury has done for C. I submit that this case may be likened to that of borrower and lender under a usurious contract, in which if the lender comes into court the borrower can safely insist upon the enforcement of the penalty; but if the borrower comes in he will be required to pay what is really and bona fide due. Hudnit v. Nash, 1 C. E. Green, 550.

Let it also be considered that this work was performed in parts and was to be paid for in parts; that is, the book was to be printed in larger and smaller type, and was to be paid for as each form came off the press; and that it nowhere appears that C. made any objections to the work or refused to receive it. And besides this, C. has recognized to some extent at least the divisibility of the contract by his payment, not only in giving the note, but in making payments upon it.

I will advise a decree that G. surrender the note, and that C. give him credit for the amount still due thereon upon his judgment. C. is entitled to costs.

1. A cross examination is never limited or controlled by the mere words and phrases used in direct examination. Where a party to a suit denies the principal allegation or charge against him, in his direct examination, he thereby lays himself liable to a cross examination upon every circumstance or transaction with which he was connected, which may tend to establish the allegation or charge.

2. In a suit for divorce, upon the ground of the adultery of the husband, where defendant denies the charge upon direct examination, he may be cross examined about whatever is unhusbandlike, whatever looks like cruelty, whatever is evidence of unfaithfulness or whatever shows an alienation of affection or estrangement on his part, provided it occurred at or about the time of the alleged adultery and within a reasonable time before the commencement of the suit.

PETITION for divorce. On appeal from a ruling by a master rejecting certain testimony sought to be elicited from defendant on cross examination. Decree reversing the ruling advised.

The facts appear in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor. See also, Pullen v. Pullen, 1 Cent. Rep. 671, and 3 Cent. Rep. 676.

Messrs. G. O. Vanderbilt and W. D. Holt, for appellee.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

Having advised that the ruling of the master rejecting testimony which was offered by the petitioner was erroneous, the defendant's counsel ask for my conclusions in writing, because they desire to appeal.

The petition is for divorce from the bonds of matrimony because of the adultery of the husband. The defendant had been examined in chief. He had been cross examined also, and amongst other things respecting his previous relations with his wife. To some of the questions put upon cross examination, respecting their conjugal intercourse, objections were made and sustained by the master. At length, as the master has it upon his notes, Mr. Stockton said:

"In order not to waste time, I will state to the master that my object is to prove that Mr. Pullen made no effort to get his wife to come back; that he drove her improperly from his house by cruelty, and—connecting that with his employment of Mrs. Lane at so early a period—to show the preparations for the commission of the act charged in the bill. Also to show from his own admissions the state of affection between his wife and himself at the time. That is, to show the absence of affection on his part towards his wife at the time he employed Mrs. Lane. I claim that this, in the form that it is put, is all proper cross examination, as it simply develops further the motives and reasons which induced him to employ a housekeeper, and created, what the evidence in chief attempts to show, the necessity of a housekeeper."

The master overruled the offer because he thought it was not a proper cross examination, and because the petitioner is precluded from inquiring into facts not set up in the petition.

In my judgment, the master was in error. The witness was the defendant; and it would be altogether too limited and tend to defeat the true exposition of a case to follow his view of the law. It is true, the counsel for defendant says that he framed his questions so as to prevent any cross examination of the witness, upon the things involved in the propositions of the attorney-general. But a cross examination is never limited or controlled by the mere words and phrases used in direct examination. If this were so the truth might forever be suppressed and the greatest aid in developing it, i. e., a cross examination, rendered of no avail. For example: the defendant is charged with adultery. It is admitted that he denied this emphatically upon direct examination. The insistence of counsel for defendant is to the effect that you can only inquire, upon cross examination, whether or not the defendant did or did not commit such act. In my judgment, such examination in chief opens the way for the fullest cross examination into the relations of the parties at or about the time of the alleged adultery. Whatever is unhusbandlike, whatever is evidence of unfaithfulness, whatever looks like cruelty, whatever shows an alienation of affection or estrangement, he may be examined about. Of course it must be within a reasonable time, for in most cases if not within a reasonable time, the doctrine of condonation would apply. This doctrine as to cross examination pervades the practice in all courts, civil and criminal. A defendant swears that he is not indebted to the plaintiff upon the note, bond or other obligation named in the declaration. Does that limit the inquiry and preclude the plaintiff from the most minute and detailed examination respecting the transaction, and of which the bond or other obligation originated, or as to what has transpired between the parties since? Certainly not.

Again; since criminals are permitted to testify in their own behalf, do they complete their defense and close the door of inquiry, by denying the commission of the crime with which they stand charged? Certainly nothing is plainer than that they may after such denial be inquired of with respect to whatever they may have said or done, or wherever they may have been, so far as either will shed any light upon the perpetration of the alleged crime or their relation thereto.

These illustrations, which are daily presenting themselves in every judicial tribunal, must suffice. Therefore, it seems to me that it may safely be regarded as a rule of universal application that where a party to a suit denies the principal allegation or charge made against him, in his direct examination, he thereby lays himself liable to a cross examination upon every circumstance or transaction with which he was connected, which may tend to establish the allegation or charge.

Hence I will advise that the ruling of the master be reversed and that the appeal therefrom be sustained, with costs.

Ralph L. PULLEN.

Parties to suits in which the evidence is taken before an examiner will not be permitted to appeal to the chancellor from the decision of a vice chancellor nor to have a rehearing before him, upon questions arising in an appeal from the rulings of the examiner admitting or rejecting evidence.

PETITION for divorce. On motion for rehearing. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Chancellor. See also, the preceding case.

Messrs. G. O. Vanderbilt and W. D. Holt, for the motion.

Mr. W. Y. Johnson, contra.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This is a motion for the rehearing of a decision of a vice chancellor upon an appeal from the decision of an examiner ruling against a certain line of cross examination.

In Runyon v. Bray, 11 Stew. 398, it was held that the chancellor himself will rehear decisions advised by a vice chancellor, only where there appear to be special reasons for so doing. No special reason appears in this case. The vice chancellor not only fully considered the subject submitted to him, but wrote out his conclusions, which are before me. The object of the rule conferring power upon examiners to decide as to the competency and admissibility of evidence cannot be fully attained if applications for rehearing by the chancellor himself of the decisions of the vice chancellors upon such rulings are to be entertained. Such applications are, in fact, appeals from the vice chancellors to the chancellor. Every consideration is opposed to the granting of them. Parties in suits tried before a vice chancellor or an advisory master are not permitted to bring before the chancellor by appeal or rehearing the rulings of such officers in such suits in regard to the competency or admissibility of evidence. No more should parties in suits in which the evidence is taken before an examiner, be permitted to appeal to the chancellor, from the decision of a vice chancellor upon an appeal from the ruling of the examiner.

The petition will be dismissed, with costs.

AMERICAN BRONZE POWDER MFG. CO.

*1. After a mill owner has acquired by prescription an easement of flowage, no cessation in the use of it will extinguish it, unless the cessation be continued uninterruptedly for the full period of twenty years, or the cessation be commenced or continued under such cir-circumstances as to evince unmistakably, an intention by the mill owner to abandon his right, and as shall also render a subsequent resumption of it by him clearly inequitable to the owner of the servient tenement.

2. A dam can only produce its full effect on the stream above when the pond is full; and therefore the evidence of witnesses, in a flowage suit, who attempt to give the usual state of the water in the pond or in the stream above from observation, but who have made their observations without knowing at the time they were made whether the pond was full or not, is entitled to very little consideration.

SUIT to compel the lowering of a dam which backed water upon complainant's land. On final hearing on bill and answer and proofs taken in open court. Relief denied.

The facts are fully stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Joseph Coult, for complainant.

Messrs. Louis Hood and Frederick W. Stevens, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The object of this suit is to compel the defendant to lower its dam. The complainant owns a farm in the Township of Caldwell, in the County of Essex, lying on both sides of a small stream called Peckman River. The course of this stream through the complainant's farm is from south to north, its waters flowing in a northerly direction. The defendant owns a tract of land adjoining the complainant's farm on the north, on which there is a mill run by water, the power for which is supplied by a dam across this stream. This dam has been in existence for over seventy years. The right of the defendant to maintain a dam on this stream is not disputed; nor is it denied that the dam maintained there was, up to the fall of 1876, a lawful structure. But the complainant says that the defendant raised the dam above its lawful height in the fall of 1876 and again in 1881 or 1882, and that the two additions thus made increased its height forty-two inches beyond the elevation at which it had a right to maintain it.

The complainant brought an action at law against the defendant, in May, 1888, which was tried in September of the same year and resulted in a judgment in favor of the complainant for substantial damages. The complainant afterwards, on the 28th of April, 1884, filed his bill in this court, praying that the defendant might be decreed "to reduce the dam to its original height, as it was prior to 1876."

The defendant, on the 10th of May following and before it answered, reduced the dam five inches and seven eighths of an inch and then answered; alleging that the dam, as thus reduced, is a lawful structure, and that its height is now no greater than of right it should be. The complainant contends, however, that the dam is still too high; and he has brought his suit to final hearing for the purpose of having the question determined whether the dam in its present reduced condition is not higher than the defendant has a right to maintain it. He insists that it is, and that his lands are, in consequence, at all times inundated with water from the defendant's pond to a greater extent than they ever were before.

The question presented for judgment requires the court to fix the height at which a dam might rightfully be maintained, at the place in question, prior to 1876. The structures existing prior to 1876 are admitted, at least impliedly, to have been lawful, for it is the addition, which the defendant made to the lawful height in the fall of 1876, that the complainant states as the foundation of his action; and it is only the excess above such height that he has a right to ask to have reduced. So that the test to be applied to the present structure is: Is the dam, as now reduced, above the height at which the defendant has a right to maintain a dam on this stream? And its right in this regard is not to be measured by the height of the structure which immediately preceded the dam built by the defendant, unless such previous structure had stood there, at the same elevation, for the full period of twenty years immediately before the fall of 1876. The previous dam may have been below the elevation at which the mill owner had a right to maintain it; if so, and it had not been kept at such reduced height for the period of twenty years, or, the mill owner, in making the reduction, did not do it under such circumstances as to conclusively evince a plain and deliberate intention to abandon all right to the excess, above such reduced height, and thereby induced the owner of the servient tenement to do something which, but for the manifestation of such intention he would not have done, he would still have a right to raise his dam to its original elevation. In other words, the settled rule on this subject may be stated as follows: after a mill owner has acquired by prescription an easement of flowage, no cessation in the use of it will extinguish it, unless the cessation be continued uninterruptedly for the full period of twenty years, or the cessation be commenced or continued under such circumstances as to evince, unmistakably, an intention by the mill owner to abandon the right, and as shall also render a subsequent resumption of it by him clearly inequitable to the owner of the servient tenement. Carlisle v. Cooper, 4 C. E. Green, 256; S. C. on appeal, 6 C. E. Green, 576.

The evidence on the part of the defendant gives what I think may be safely regarded as a trustworthy history of the several dams which have existed at the point in question since about 1845. A witness who now owns a mill located on the same stream, about a mile and a half below that of the defendant, and whose recollection of the several dams which, during the period intervening since 1846, have existed at the mill now owned by the defendant, seems clearer and more perfect than that of any other witness who has given evidence upon that subject, describes the dam existing there in 1846 as follows: the westerly end of the dam, he says, consisted of a stone bulkhead, higher than any other part of the dam, about thirty feet in length; next came a set of flood gates, covering, in their united length, a space of about ten feet; next to them stood a stone buttress twelve or fifteen feet in length, and then came another set of flood gates, greater in length than the first set; and lastly, a dam constructed of stone, with earth placed in front of it, extending far enough to the east to strike the natural grade of the earth east of the pond. On the top of this stone dam last mentioned, the witness says pieces of timber, round saplings, were laid, which were held in position by other pieces of timber standing upright, mortised at the top and imbedded in the stones of the dam, so that the timbers lying on the dam rested in the mortises of the uprights, and were thus held firmly and made perfectly secure. These pieces of timber lying on the top of the dam constituted, the witness says, the lip of the dam, and marked the efficient height of the dam. When the pond was full, the first water which escaped from it flowed over this lip; and this part of the dam constituted what mill owners call the overflow or tumble of the dam. But he also says that while this part of the dam was the lowest and furnished the first means of escape for the water when the pond was full, it was never used as a waste way or outlet in times of flood, but that at such times the flood gates were hoisted and the surplus water discharged through them. This description of the dam of 1846 is admitted, by all the witnesses who claim to have any knowledge respecting it, to be in the main correct. Others testify to a widely different recollection as to the height of this part of the dam, when compared with certain other parts, from that sworn to by this witness; but in other respects they, with entire uniformity, agree as to the general accuracy of his description.

The dam of 1846 remained unchanged until 1860, then one set of flood gates went out, and were replaced the same year. After this no further change occurred until 1866 or 1868 (the witnesses differ as to the year, but I think the weight of the evidence shows the year to have been 1868); then the whole central part of the dam, consisting of the two sets of flood gates and the stone buttress, was carried away leaving the bulkhead on the west and the stone dam on the east still standing. They remained substantially in the same condition in which they were in 1846.

The central part of the dam was replaced the same year; but it was constructed in a different manner and to some extent of different material from its predecessor. It was made principally of wood and without flood gates. The person who built it swears that when he quit work on it, it was from four to six inches lower than the lip of the eastern part of the dam, and that its height was never subsequently increased, except temporarily by placing planks or boards on it, which were afterwards taken off. No further change was made in the dam after this until August, 1875; then the central part of it was again carried away; but its two extremities, which had withstood the previous floods, also withstood that of 1875. They remained intact. The dam remained in this broken condition until the fall of 1876. The central part of it was then restored and raised above the lip of the eastern part of the dam about six inches. Other changes were made at the same time. The proofs make it entirely certain that a part of the lip of the eastern part of the dam, being the piece of timber lying farthest west and next to that part of the dam which had been repeatedly washed away, still remained in the fall of 1876, and also as late as September, 1888, in its place, intact and unchanged.

Now, although the only fact stated in the complainant's bill, as his ground of action, is that the defendant in 1876, and subsequently, raised its dam above its lawful height, and thereby caused the water in the pond to flow back upon his lands to his injury, yet he did not, in attempting to establish his case in the first instance, offer a word of testimony tending to show directly that the dam erected in 1876 was higher than the dam which had existed there from 1846 to 1868. He made no effort whatever, in the first instance, by direct testimony, to show either the height of the dam of 1846, or any previous or subsequent dam; or how any such previous dam compared in height with the dam of 1876. The proofs he offered, to establish his case, consist entirely of the recollection of witnesses as to the difference in the quantity of water found at certain points along the pond and in the stream above the pond, since 1876, as compared with the quantity found at these several points at various dates prior to 1876; his purpose being by this sort of proof to demonstrate that the quantity found at these places since 1876, when the waters of the stream were unaffected by exceptional conditions of the weather, and in their ordinary state, has been greater than it was previous to that year, and thus establish by inference that the dam must have been higher since 1876 than it was before.

His proofs of this description were mainly directed to five different localities viz.: first, a ford about 1,200 feet south of the dam, and used by the complainant to go from his land on the west side of the stream to his land on the east side; second, the northeast corner of the complainant's meadow on the west side of the pond, and adjacent to the mill property of the defendant; third, two rocks on the west side of the pond, standing in the pond, on land of the defendant; fourth, two small runs or guts on the east side of the pond, which some of the witnesses have called slanks; and fifth, the east shore of the pond.

Under the view I take of this evidence no synopsis of it needs to be given. Without entering into details, I think this may be stated as its fair result: that a large majority of the complainant's witnesses agree that as they compare the quantity of water which they found at such of these places as they have recently examined, with the quantity which existed there in years past, according to their present recollection, and some of the comparisons which have been attempted to be made, were between the state of the water as far back as 1810, and its state in 1883 and 1884, they believe that the quantity is greater now than it was prior to 1876; some of them declaring that the difference in quantity is so great as to leave no doubt on their minds that the capacity of the pond has been very greatly increased.

But the value of these opinions as evidence is very greatly impaired, according to my judgment, by the fact that the witnesses who utter them differ very widely in material respects, among themselves. For example: several of them fix the southerly line of the pond, the point where the natural flow of the stream ceased or the motion of its waters became so slight as to be imperceptible, prior to 1876, when the stream was in its ordinary state, as thirty or forty feet below or north of the complainant's ford, while others put it within six, eight and ten feet of the ford and one just on the lower side of the pond; and another says that when the pond was full the water of the pond flowed back on the ford; and still another says that when the pond was full its waters flowed back over the ford and beyond it. This great discordance renders one thing tolerably certain: either that the condition of this stream, when unaffected by exceptional or accidental causes, is subject to great variations, or otherwise these witnesses have adopted widely different standards for determining when its waters are in their ordinary and usual state.

There can be no doubt that the whole value of this evidence, so far as it can have any effect in demonstrating how the dam affected the stream above it, depends entirely upon the fact whether, at the time these witnesses made the observations by which they fix the southerly line of the pond as being below the ford, the pond was full or not; for it is perfectly manifest that it is simply impossible for any person to ascertain, by mere observation, how far a dam will cause the water of the stream on which it is placed to flow back, or at what point above the dam the dam will impede the natural flow of the stream, unless such observation is made when the pond is full. It is only when the pond is full that the dam produces its full effect, and shows how far up the stream it will impede the natural flow of the stream. If the dam is a lawful structure, the usual or ordinary condition of the stream above the dam is that and that only which exists when the pond is full and the stream is unaffected by exceptional or accidental causes. Now although these are familiar truths, about which there can be no dispute, yet it appears that all of the complainant's witnesses speaking to this point, except the last two, state that they are unable to say from personal knowledge what was the condition of the water at the dam, whether it was flowing over the dam, or stood below it, when they made the observations which induce them to fix the southerly limit of the pond, prior to 1876, as being anywhere from the lower side of the ford to forty feet below it. Hence, if it be conceded that the observations of these witnesses were carefully made, under such circumstances as were likely to impress what they saw very firmly upon their memories, and that their recollection of what they then saw is still, notwithstanding the lapse of many years, fresh and strong, still, I think it is very clear that it would be giving their evidence, even if it stood wholly uncontroverted, in any material respect, a much greater force than it is justly entitled to, to declare that it established the fact on which the complainant's right to relief rests.

But the defendant controverts the case made by the complainant at all these points. It has offered evidence showing, according to the observations and recollection of its witnesses, that since the dam was lowered there is no more water at any of these points, when the stream is unaffected by exceptional causes, than existed there for a long series of years prior to 1876. The evidence of two of them is in my judgment of the most important character. One of them says that in 1860 he carted logs for the complainant for about a dozen days, extending over a period of four or five months, and that in crossing the ford in the morning, before the mill started, when the pond was full, the water would be two and a half feet deep, coming up to the bellies of his horses; but after the mill started, the water would run down, and when he made the second crossing there would be much less water on the ford. He also says that the southerly line of the pond, at that time, when the pond was full, was from eight to twelve feet south of the ford. The other says that he crossed the ford over thirty years ago, for the purpose of carting logs, and that at that time the water on the ford, when he went over in the early part of the day, was so deep that it came over the front bolster of his wagon, showing a depth of quite three feet; and that when he returned, the water would be so far drawn down that he could cross the ford on foot, by stepping from the top of one stone to another. He also says that the southerly line of the pond at that time extended beyond the ford. Other witnesses testify to many other facts leading with more or less directness to the same general conclusion. Special allusion has been made to the evidence of the two because of the high value which I think their evidence possesses. The facts they state show, with great distinctness, the remarkable changes which daily occurred in the condition of the water at the ford, from ordinary causes; thus making it easy to explain, without impugning the integrity of any of the witnesses, how it has happened that such a wide divergence exists in the evidence on this branch of the case.

This stream and pond are both small and the volume of water in each is, in consequence, liable to be very greatly varied by very trifling causes. A single heavy shower will fill the stream and make it very turbulent and send so much water into the pond that, to save the dam, the flood gates must be hoisted; while running the mill for a few hours, when the pond is full, will draw the water down far below the top of the dam.

Prior to 1876 the mill was only run in the daytime; no water was used at night, and the reason it was not was that a sufficient supply might be collected at night for the next day. The defendant now only uses the water for three or four hours out of each twenty-four. The complainant himself says that he has known the volume of water, running at the ford, in a dry time, to be increased from one or two inches to six inches and perhaps more, by the mill immediately above being started; and one of his witnesses, who swore that he had been familiar with the condition of the water at the ford for over forty-five years, said that he had known the water at the ford to be increased, by the same cause, from two or three inches to a foot. It is evident, therefore, that it is impossible, in consequence of the variable character of this stream, to fix with precision or within a few inches the elevation at which the defendant has a right to maintain its dam, by evidence consisting merely of the recollection of witnesses as to the quantity of water existing at a particular locality at one time, as contrasted with the quantity found there at another time. The quantity, it appears, varied widely, not only with the season but daily and almost hourly, and the variation was irregular; when the mill above was running, the operation of the mill below would draw down the water of the pond much less rapidly and quickly than it would when the upper mill was standing still; so that a person, being at a particular place on the pond at one hour in the day, would necessarily adopt a very different standard for the usual height of the water there, from that which another person, who happened there at a different hour, would adopt as his standard. Besides, the picture remaining before an ordinary memory of what was seen casually, although frequently, as long ago as fifteen or twenty years, can rarely be implicitly relied upon as a safe guide in determining anything so vague and shifting as the usual height of the water of a stream or pond at a particular place.

Just in this connection it is important to state that the defendant applied to the complainant, while building the dam of 1876, for information as to its rightful height, and that he, after going to the dam and viewing it, said he could not tell because he did not know. It is not pretended that he made this answer because he did not want to commit himself, nor from a mere spirit of churlishness. He says that his answer was sincere and truthful. And yet it is undeniable that all the means then existed for determining the true height of the dam, and were well known to the complainant, which he has since attempted to use to show that the dam as it now exists is too high. But one deduction can be made from this conduct: the complainant did not then regard the facts, upon which he now relies, as furnishing trustworthy evidence of the rightful height of the dam.

There is evidence in the case, however, which is sufficiently certain and definite to enable the court to reach an entirely satisfactory conclusion on the question presented for judgment. The witnesses on both sides are agreed that a part of the dam of 1846 was standing intact, in the fall of 1876. I refer now more particularly to the west end of the eastern part of the dam where pieces of timber lay, supported by upright braces.

And there is proof on the part of the defendant, which is uncontradicted, that these pieces of timber and braces were still there, in their original position as late as September, 1888. The witness who gives this evidence testified on the trial at law on the call of the complainant, and here on the call of the defendant. He now says, after he had given evidence on the trial at law, and while the trial was still in progress, that, for the purpose of satisfying himself that the evidence he had already given was accurate, he made a further examination of the dam, by making measurements and taking levels; and that at that time he saw these pieces of timber and observed that they were still in their original position and made measurements from them for the purpose of ascertaining how much higher the dam then in existence was, than the dam of 1846. He was afterwards recalled on the trial at law, and then gave in evidence the result of his re-examination of the dam, in confirmation of his previous testimony. His evidence, taken in connection with the evidence of other witnesses who have given testimony respecting the continued existence of these and other remnants of the dam of 1846, shows that when the defendant lowered its dam in May, 1884, enough of the dam of 1846 still remained, at its original elevation and substantially unchanged, to enable the court to fix the height at which the defendant has a right to maintain a dam there with reasonable if not absolute certainty.

This witness says that the piece of timber lying on the top of the west end of the eastern part of the dam and resting in the mortises of the upright braces constituted a part of the lip of the dam of 1846, and marked in part the efficient height of that dam; the water, when the pond was full, first escaping over this lip. The defendant, in lowering its dam, adopted the standard furnished by the testimony of this witness, and reduced the dam in conformity thereto. The reduction was made under his direction and in conformity to measurements made by him. If his testimony is true the dam is now no higher than it should be, and the complainant has already had by the act of the defendant itself all the relief he is entitled to.

This witness, as already stated, was called on the trial of the action at law to give evidence against the defendant, and then testified that the dam erected by the defendant was higher than the dam of 1846, and stated how and why he knew that to be the fact. He also designated the extent of the excess. His testimony is of the kind that produces conviction. His evidence in this case exhibits a more thorough, complete and exact knowledge of the several dams which have existed at the place in question since 1845, than that of any other witness. Indeed, he is the only witness called by either party, whose recollection of the dam of 1846 continues, after this great lapse of time, so distinct and perfect that he is able to give a full and clear description of it, delineating not only how its several parts were constructed and of what material they were made but also their relative elevations. He is unquestionably a careful and intelligent observer and endowed with a remarkably retentive memory. His demeanor on the witness stand satisfied me that he is a just and truthful man. He seems to be prudent in judgment and cautious in his speech. In giving his evidence I believe that he uttered nothing that he was not fully persuaded was the truth. I think he meant to declare the whole truth, concealing nothing and exaggerating nothing. I am thoroughly convinced of the substantial truth of his testimony.

I think the defendant was, therefore, entirely justified in the situation in which it was placed, being strangers to the locality and without personal knowledge of the height of any of the previous dams and with no means of fixing the true height of its dam except those furnished by the evidence produced on the trial at law, in adopting the standard of height furnished by the testimony of this witness. It is undoubtedly true that if the dam is still too high, the mere fact that the defendant reduced it, according to the standard fixed by this witness, will give it no right to the excess; but it shows, I think, that it has acted in good faith and with a sincere desire to respect the just rights of the complainant.

But the accuracy of the testimony of this witness in its most important particular is disputed. He says it will be remembered that the piece of timber lying on the west end of the eastern part of the dam, marked the efficient height of the dam of 1846, being one of the lowest points of that dam. His testimony in this respect, it is contended, is incorrect. And it is true that a number of witnesses, some called by the complainant and others by the defendant, have testified that according to their recollection the point which witness designated as the lowest part of the dam, or as low as any, was not the lowest but was higher than certain other parts. They say that the dam, according to their recollection, was lowest in the middle, where the flood gates were, and at its eastern extremity; the dam at these two points being on the same level and lower than it was anywhere else. There is entire uniformity in the recollection of the witnesses, who testify in this wise: that when the pond was full the water escaped from it, either over the extreme eastern end of the dam or around the east end of the dam as soon as it did in the middle or at any other point, their recollection being that the middle of the dam and the east end of it were on the same level.

Now the proof is clear and undisputed that a waste board was placed at the extreme east end of the dam a great many years ago, to serve as an outlet or waste way when the pond was full. That board, according to the testimony of one of the complainant's witnesses, who says he assisted in putting it in its place, still remained in its place, at its original elevation, at the time this cause was heard, as firm and as solid as it was the day it was put there. The fact is undisputed that a level taken from this board shows that the defendant's dam, as it now stands, is nearly an inch lower than the top of this board. So it is manifest that whether the one criterion or the other, for settling the true height of the dam, be adopted, the result reached must be exactly the same. A careful consideration of that part of the evidence which, in my judgment, is sufficiently certain and definite to be fit to serve as a guide to the judgment has led my mind to a very strong conviction that the dam as it now stands is no higher than the defendant has a right to maintain it, and consequently that the complainant is not entitled to the relief he seeks.

When the complainant filed his bill he had a good cause of action. That fact is beyond dispute. The judgment at law established it, and the defendant's subsequent act in lowering the dam admitted it. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the complainant is entitled to recover the costs of his suit up to the time the dam was lowered; and it would seem to be equally clear that since then the defendant is entitled to recover the costs of its defense. The decree to be made should, I think, therefore, declare that the complainant at the time he brought his suit had a good cause of action against the defendant, and was then entitled to a decree adjudging that the defendant's dam should be lowered; but it appearing that the defendant had, before answering, reduced its dam to its lawful height, the complainant is not now entitled to any relief in this suit, except that the defendant pay him the taxed costs incurred by him in his suit up to the time that it filed its answer, and that the taxed costs incurred by the defendant in its defense, since then, should be paid by the complainant.

SUPREME COURT.

August HECKSCHER, Piff.,

Charles W. TROTTER.

- *1. The defendant had possession of a mine under a lease in which he covenanted to pay $2 a ton royalty for all ore mined and removed, and to mine and remove 10,000 tons per annum. Held, that attachment would not lie for the damages accruing on breach of the covenant to mine and remove the stipulated quantity.
2. The plaintiff's preliminary affidavit in attachment is not conclusive as to the nature of his claim.
3. The defendant in attachment may give bond and have his personal property discharged, after appearing and pleading in the action.

(Decided August 26, 1886.)

ATTACHMENT. On rule to show cause. Property discharged on giving bond.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

See also other branches of the same litigation in 2 Cent. Rep. 729, and 3 Cent. Rep. 468, 677.

Mr. H. C. Pitney, for plaintiff:

All irregularities in the issuing of the first of the three writs of attachment in this case are waived by the appearance. This is the rule in cases of suits commenced by capias, and it applies with equal force to cases of attachment.

If the party wishes to attack the sufficiency of the affidavit or the cause of action he must do it before appearance.

Dalton v. Barnes, 1 Maule & S. 280; D'Argent v. Vivant, 1 East, 330; Clifford v. Frankford, 37 N. J. L. 152; Drake, Attachment, 112; Waples, Attachment, 392.

Defendant therefore cannot proceed under either sections 33 or 34 of the Attachment Act, and does not ask to proceed under section 37; and so must be presumed to proceed under section 39, which is the only provision for releasing the lien of the attachment after appearance.

That section, 39, is confined to personal property; and the bond is to be in such sum and upon such conditions as the court shall direct.

The only question for the court to determine, then, is: In what amount and upon what condition shall the bond be given?

The defendants covenanted to pay $2 per ton for each ton actually mined and to so work the mine as to raise 10,000 tons per year. This makes the amount prima facie to be recovered $20,000 a year, unless the ores raised exceed 10,000 tons in any year, in which case it would be so much more.

*Head notes by DIXON, J.

The court should require a bond in double the amount which the plaintiff may, under any view of the case, recover.

In the case of the second writ, defendant has also appeared and thereby waived any defect in the affidavit.

In the case of the third writ no appearance has been entered, and defendant is at liberty to inquire into the sufficiency of the cause of action to sustain the attachment.

The objection is that in this case we must depend, for our recovery, wholly upon the clause of the covenant which provides for raising at least 10,000 tons a year, and that the damages for such breach are unliquidated; and hence, that special bail could not at common law have been demanded of course, and that hence attachment will not lie.

The cause of action is clearly sufficient under the rulings of our neighboring States, upon statutes substantially like ours.

Drake, Attachment, §§ 12-23; Lenox v. Howland, 3 Caines, 323; Re Marty, 8 Barb. 229; Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. 382.

The principle there laid down includes this case.

Strock v. Little, 45 Pa. St. 416; New Haven Steam S. M. Co. v. Fowler, 28 Conn. 108.

In the present case there is a clear measure of damages fixed by the contract itself; and that is the test laid down in most of the cases for distinguishing between liquidated and unliquidated damages in actions on contract.

Wilson v. Wilson, 8 Gill, 192; Drake, Attachment, § 15; Roelofson v. Hatch, 8 Mich. 277; Drake, § 22.

Attachment will lie for assumpsit on a quantum meruit, goods sold and delivered, work and labor done and the like, where no price was agreed upon.

Boyd v. King, 86 N. J. L. 184, 188.

The contract taken as a whole amounts to a sale to defendant of at least 10,000 tons of ore a year, to be taken away at any time during the term, and defendant has entered into possession and must pay the price.

A view which would give the plaintiff anything less than a right prima facie to recover the whole price of the ore would leave him with no remedy except expulsion of the defendant from the premises.

The defendant's position as a purchaser in possession is much better than that of a vendee of chattels sued on a claim for goods bargained and sold but not delivered, or that of a vendee of real estate upon an unexecuted contract, who is sued for the purchase money.

In both instances the vendor may recover the whole price.

1 Sedg. Dam. 281, 7th ed. 596, 597; Dustan v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 72; Field, Dam. §§ 299, 300; Story, Sales, §§ 436, 438; Mayne, Dam. 116; Benj. Sales, by Corbin, § 1127.

In cases of contract for sale of land, if there be a covenant to purchase and pay the purchase money upon delivery of the deed, then upon such tender the vendor may recover the whole purchase money; provided he continues at all times ready to deliver and does nothing to disable himself to make a complete title.

Havkins v. Kemp, 8 East, 410; Franchot v. Leach, 5 Cow. 506; Richards v. Edick, 17 Barb. 260; Gill v. Bicknell, 2 Cush. 355, 358; Jacobs v.

There has never been any doubt as to the right to recover the purchase price in such an action, when the covenant on the part of the purchaser is express to pay the purchase money upon tender of the conveyance. The doubt has arisen in cases of mere covenants to purchase at a price, without a covenant to pay in so many words.

The objection to a recovery at law was that the vendor held the title and might never convey.

Laird v. Pim, 7 M. & W. 474.

This modern English rule arises naturally out of their complicated methods of conveying, but has no application in this country.

Mr. C. Parker, for defendant.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On December 16, 1884, the plaintiff made affidavit that the defendant was nonresident and was justly indebted to him in the sum of $35,000 for rents and royalties accrued upon a certain indenture of lease, and on filing the affidavit with the clerk of this court writs of attachment were issued to the sheriff of Sussex and Mercer. Under these writs personal property valued at $25,894 was attached. Subsequently the defendant appeared and pleaded in the suit, and thereafter, on May 4, 1886, obtained a rule that the plaintiff show cause why the defendant should not be permitted to give a bond in double the sum of $12,000 and thereupon have his property released and discharged from the lien of the writs, upon the ground that the residue of the sum claimed in the plaintiff's affidavit consisted of damages in covenant, for which no attachment can legally issue.

On the return of this rule it appears that the lease referred to is dated April 10, 1879, and demises to the defendant a vein of Franklinite ore for fifteen years, reserving to the lessor, from whom the plaintiff has derived title, a rent or royalty of $2 a ton for all the ore mined and removed from the premises; and containing a stipulation on the part of the defendant that he will mine and remove at least 10,000 tons of ore per annum. It also appears that the plaintiff's claim covers the period from April 10, 1888, to October 10, 1884, and is for 6,439 tons of ore mined and removed, and for the defendant's failure to mine and remove the stipulated quantity.

The principal question raised upon the rule is, whether attachment will lie for a demand accruing by reason of a breach of this covenant to mine and remove 10,000 tons per year.

The general rule established in this State is that "an attachment will not lie for unliquidated damages, and can be used only when the demand is for a sum certain." Schenck v. Griffin, 38 N. J. L. 462, 467.

An attachment will lie where the cause of action is founded upon contract and is of such a nature that the plaintiff would formerly have been entitled to hold the defendant to bail upon filing an affidavit of the cause of action. When the cause of action arises ex delicto, or is of such a nature that bail could not have been required without the order of a court or judge, resort cannot be had to this remedy. Jeffery v. Wooley, 5 Halst. 123; Boyd v. King, 36 N. J. L. 134.

With regard to bail, Mr. Petersdorff says: "The general rule adopted by all the courts is consistent and uniform, that where the cause of action arises from a debt or money demand, or where it sounds in damages, but the damages are capable of being ascertained with certainty, by mere arithmetical computation, the defendant may be held to bail as of course; but on the other hand, where the cause of action consists merely in a right to recover some damages, but those damages are general, indefinite and undetermined, or incapable of being reduced by calculation to a proper degree of certainty, without the intervention of a jury, the defendant cannot be held to bail as of course." Petersdorff, Bail, 16, 10 Law Lib.

"In particular, in an action of covenant, the defendant cannot be held to bail as of course, unless the covenant be for the payment of a sum certain." Jeffery v. Wooley, supra.

Thus far the decisions in New Jersey carry us. When we look to the decisions in other States, we find most of them to be inapplicable, because they rest upon rules inconsistent with those already established here. But the cases of Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. 382; Clark's Exrs. v. Wilson, 3 Wash. C. C. 560; Wilson v. Wilson, 8 Gill, 193, and Warwick v. Chase, 23 Md. 154, seem to proceed on the lines which our own courts have laid down, and hence are useful as illustrations of the rule.

In Fisher v. Consequa the defendant had bound himself to put on board ship at Canton, a cargo of teas of the very first quality, for the Amsterdam market, and, if they did not prove of such quality at the sales in Amsterdam, to make good all deficiencies. At the sales in Amsterdam the teas proved to be of inferior quality, and worth $4,500 less than teas of the first quality. The court held that attachment would lie for the deficiency.

In Wilson v. Wilson, the defendants sold flour to the plaintiff and guaranteed that it should pass with the inspector as superfine, and that if it did not they would make such allowance as was customary at the place of inspection for the difference between flour of the grade certified by the inspector, and superfine flour. The flour was certified by the inspector to be of an inferior grade, and the difference in value according to the custom was 50 cents per barrel. The court held that the difference could be sued for by attachment.

In both of these cases the standard for measuring the damages was fixed by the contract, the damages being the difference in value of two articles, the value of which was already determined either by the sale of the articles themselves, or by the market price of other articles of like value. Damages so ascertained, or by calculation ascertainable, could properly be sworn to by the plaintiff.

In Clark's Exrs. v. Wilson the plaintiff attached for damages arising out of a breach of the defendant's covenant in a charter-party to employ a vessel for a designated voyage at $670 per month. The plaintiff swore that the voyage would have consumed twenty-four months, and rated his damages accordingly. The court held that the length of the voyage was conjectural, and hence the damages were so uncertain that they could not with propriety be averred in an affidavit but must be ascertained by a jury, and that the attachment was illegally used.

In Warwick v. Chase the claim was for damages occasioned by delay in selling a cargo of flour at Rio, and by failure to invest the proceeds in a cargo of coffee for return to Richmond. The court held that as the damages depended mainly upon the price of coffee in Richmond at the time when the return cargo would have arrived, and that time was not fixed, the damages were too uncertain for attachment. It was declared: "The general rule is that unliquidated damages resulting from the violation of a contract cannot be recovered by attachment, unless the contract affords a certain measure or standard for ascertaining the amount of the damages; * * * the standard should be a subject matter of the contract; * * * the standard must be shown by the contract, without the aid of inferences from extrinsic facts or circumstances."

In the case now before us the plaintiff insists that the damages recoverable for breach of the covenant to mine 10,000 tons a year are such as will sustain attachment within the principles of these decisions. He contends for one of the three following positions: first, that the covenant is substantially to pay $2 a ton for at least 10,000 tons per annum; second, that the defendant being put in exclusive possession of the mine, it is as if at least 10,000 tons of ore per annum had been sold and delivered to him at $2 a ton; third, that when less than 10,000 tons a year are mined, he is at any rate entitled to the stipulated price of 10,000 tons, less the value in the mine of the difference between 10,000 tons and the quantity of ore mined in each year; and that the value of ore in the mine is ascertainable with as much definiteness as that of merchandise generally; and hence, as attachment will lie for the value of general merchandise sold without a price stated, all the elements for calculating his damages are capable of being determined with sufficient certainty to warrant an attachment.

His first position is manifestly not in accordance with the contract; for that, by expressly binding the defendant to pay $2 a ton for ore mined, and being silent as to what he shall pay for ore not mined, precludes us, by the plainest implication, from putting the two classes of ore on the same footing as to price. His second position is as evidently untenable; for it ignores the fact that the defendant, although in possession of the mine, has acquired and can acquire no ownership in the ore, except it be actually severed.

The liability of a purchaser for the price of goods sold rests upon his having become their owner. Hence, the attempted analogy fails at the very basis. His third position is more plausible, but is also, I think, unsound. One of its postulates is that the value of the ore unmined is fixed with such reasonable certainty as to justify the plaintiff in swearing to it. But this is not to be conceded; for even the thing to be valued is itself not ascertained, since the defendant was at liberty to mine the 10,000 tons from any part of the leased vein; and, had the very ore been ascertained, its richness would be a matter for conjecture only, so long as it lay imbedded in the rock. An article thus conditioned is not to be compared with merchandise of determinable quality and commonly sold in the market, when the question is: How shall its value be settled?

It seems to me that neither the contract nor the law prescribes any standard for measuring the damages accruing to the plaintiff on breach of this covenant, sufficiently definite for their proper ascertainment, without the intervention of a jury, and hence, that the writ of attachment cannot legally be issued for their recovery.

The plaintiff further contends that his preliminary affidavit is conclusive, or at least that the defendant, by appearing and pleading without objection, is estopped from questioning the propriety of the writ.

The affidavit is not conclusive as to the nature of the plaintiff's claim. Day v. Bennett, 8 Harr. 287; Shadduck v. Marsh, 1 Zab. 434; S. C. 1 Zab. 468.

Nor should the defendant's appearing and pleading in the action impair his right to investigate the propriety of the plaintiff's claim to a special statutory lien upon his property. By appearing generally, the defendant acknowledges that "due steps have been taken to bring him personally into court to answer whatever demands the plaintiff may lawfully present in such an action as he has instituted; and by pleading, the defendant confines the inquiry touching his personal liability to the issues which his pleadings raise; but neither of these concessions seems to involve an obligation to leave his property charged with a lien for which there was no lawful warrant. The position of the plaintiff is not altered to his detriment in the least, by the defendant's giving bond now after pleading, instead of at the time of entering his appearance. Moreover, sections 38 and 39 of the Attachment Act contemplate this mode of procedure.

Let the property attached be discharged, on the defendant's giving such bond as would have been required by the Statute, in case the plaintiff had sworn to a debt of $12,878, being the royalty of $2 a ton for 6,439 tons of ore mined and removed.

Two other writs of attachment were subsequently issued, at the suit of the same plaintiff against the same defendant, for claims of similar character arising on the same lease. On like rules obtained by the defendant, it appears that (besides claims for unliquidated damages for failure to mine) the plaintiff claims under each writ $2 per ton royalty for 1,700 tons of ore mined and stored by the defendant "on the earth about 100 feet from the mouth of the shaft, being on the mine hill tract mentioned in the deed from Fowler to Curtis." On these claims the question raised is, whether ore thus mined and stored is ore mined and removed from the demised premises, within the meaning of the lease.

Among the facts agreed upon under the rules, the lease is set out in full, and the deed from Fowler to Curtis appears in part. From what is thus shown we are not able to conclude that the place of storage is upon the demised premises. Hence, the royalty seems to be earned.

According to the decision in the first case, the bonds required will be, in the second case, as if the plaintiff had sworn to a debt of $4,160, being $2 a ton for 2,080 tons, and in the third case, as if he had sworn to a debt of $3,400, being $2 a ton for 1,700 tons.

v.

Inhabitants of the CITY OF TRENTON.

1. Where the report of the board of assessors in a proceeding to condemn lands for a street opening in Trenton shows that the assessors met at the time and place appointed, and no proof is presented to show the fact to be otherwise, the report must be accepted as true.
2. Such report should show what notice of the meeting of the assessors was given and what manner of publication was adopted.
3. Everything necessary to give validity to the action of a special tribunal should appear in the report of its proceedings.
4. The assessors could not appoint meetings after the expiration of thirty days from the time appointed for their first meeting.
5. The requirement of the charter that the report be completed and filed within thirty days after the first meeting is mandatory, and compliance therewith is essential to the validity of the proceedings.

ON certiorari to review the proceedings taken in the opening of Sweet's Avenue, in the City of Trenton. Proceedings set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. W. Macpherson, for prosecutor.

Mr. G. D. W. Vroom, for defendant.

Knapp, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under this writ the prosecutor draws in question the validity of proceedings on the condemnation of his lands in opening a street in the City of Trenton.

The first objection is that in several particulars the City failed to observe the provisions of the eighty-first section of the Act to provide for the more efficient government of the City of Trenton. Pamph. L. 1874, p. 372.

If, under the terms of the charter, the City is unable to agree with the owner of lands needed for a public street for their purchase, application is to be made by the common council to the board of assessors, to value the lands and damages and assess the sum of these upon lands and real estate specially benefited by the proposed street opening. The section referred to requires that "the common council shall designate a time and place for the meeting of the said board of assessors;" of which time and place the city clerk shall give notice by advertisement in not less than two newspapers published and circulated in said city, at least ten days before the time of meeting. It is made the duty of the board of assessors to meet at the time and place appointed, to proceed to view the lands and make a just and true estimate and assessment, and report their proceedings to the common council, which report shall be in writing, and filed within thirty days after their first meeting.

The first error in procedure alleged is, that the common council having appointed the 25th day of July, 1888, at the city hall, as the time and place for the assessors to meet, no notice was given by the clerk of such meeting, and no meeting was then held. The report, although dated at a much later day, shows that the assessors did meet at the time and place appointed; and no proof having been taken to show the fact to be otherwise, it must be accepted as true. The report also states that the city clerk "gave due notice by advertisement according to law" of the time and place of such meeting. What notice was given and what manner of publication was adopted does not otherwise appear. This should have appeared in the report. The tribunal here acting in the condemnation of lands for public use was special, and everything necessary to give validity to its action should appear in the report of its proceedings. State v. Jersey City, 1 Dutcher, 809.

The second objection is that the board of assessors delayed action beyond the time limited in the charter for the completion of their work, and consequently failed to file their report within thirty days after their first meeting, as the charter requires.

The report of the assessors bears date December 31, 1888, more than five months after the time appointed for their first meeting. This delay is not accounted for. It does not appear that their proceedings were continued by adjournments, and there is no evidence that subsequent meetings were advertised, or that any notice was given of them. They might adjourn from time to time after their first meeting held pursuant to appointment and notice, within the thirty days. But after the expiration of the statutory time they could not appoint meetings or change that made by the common council. It was held in State v. Jersey City, under charter provisions like those of Trenton, that the common council must fix the time of meeting and could not delegate that duty to the city clerk. Certainly the assessors, without delegation, could not assume the authority.

But it is said that the requirement of the charter that the report be completed and filed with the city clerk within a limited time is mere direction, in which the land owner can have no interest or concern. But I think it is mandatory, and under the rule which requires rigid adhesion to provisions in legislation conferring upon subordinate bodies power to condemn lands for public use, they were bound to make their assessment, and return it within the statutory period. The land owner is interested in every step in such a procedure. He has the right to inspect the report as soon as it is promulgated, and he may assume that it will be filed, if at all, as the statute directs. He has no other means of knowing when it will be open for his inspection; and he is not required to be waiting and watching for an indefinite period.

The law requires the report to be before the common council at their meeting held next after the time of filing, and that body is given four months from the time the report comes to them to decide whether they will take and pay for the lands or abandon the improvement scheme, and it is the interest of the land owner that these provisions of law shall be observed.

We think the defects existing in these proceedings are sufficient to defeat them, and they should be set aside, with costs.

ERROR to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action for personal injuries caused by negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Besson and J. B. Vredenburg, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. M. T. Newbold, for defendant in error.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John May brought suit against the North Hudson County Railway Company, for damages resulting from personal injuries received by him, caused by the alleged negligence of said Company. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff and judgment was entered thereon.

The first error assigned is, that the court admitted the plaintiff below to be sworn and give evidence in the cause. It is contended that the plaintiff in error, a Corporation aggregate, being only an artificial person, incapable of speaking and giving testimony, the opposing party cannot be permitted to testify, because of the provision of the statute which provides that no party shall be sworn where the opposite party is prohibited by any legal disability from being sworn as a witness.

It is true that a corporation is an artificial being, invisible and intangible; but it is a collection of individuals united in one body, acting and speaking through its officers and agents.

* Head notes by PARKER, J.

Since the law which enacts that interest in the event shall not disqualify a witness, the officers and agents as well as stockholders, are admitted to testify. So long as they are admitted as witnesses, the corporation cannot be said to be under legal disability.

The court was right in admitting May as a witness.

The next error assigned is the refusal of the court to nonsuit. When the plaintiff in the suit rested, it appeared from the testimony that he was at the time of the accident riding on a horse car of the Company, and was thrown off in consequence of the sudden starting of the car by the driver. It also appeared that the car inside was full of passengers; that the platform on which May was riding was crowded and also that the rear platform was full. It also appeared that he stood on the front platform holding on, when the violence of the sudden jerk caused by the driver whipping his horses threw him off the car. It further appeared that May was riding as a passenger on defendant's car in the only place he could find. The driver had received him as a passenger and was bound to exercise care towards him, so as to carry him safely. When the case was rested on the part of May, it had been proved that the Company was negligent in starting the car suddenly with force and speed sufficient to throw him off the platform, and there was no evidence that May had contributed to the accident.

The court did right in refusing to nonsuit.

After the motion to nonsuit was refused, the Company proceeded to call witnesses, and introduced evidence to contradict the testimony which had been given as to the negligence of the Company, and also to prove negligence on the part of May. Witnesses swore that May was not on the car when the accident occurred but at the time was trying to get on the car, while it was in motion; also that the driver did not whip the horses to start the car.

The case was submitted to the jury upon the evidence produced on both sides, which was contradictory. The motion to nonsuit was not renewed, nor was the court asked to instruct the jury to find for the Company. Under the circumstances, the refusal to nonsuit, if wrong, cannot now be taken advantage of. The case was tried on its merits and the jury gave credence to the testimony offered on the part of May. Upon writ of error the court will not set aside the judgment, even if it be thought that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. There must be some error in the instructions to the jury by the court, or in refusing to charge, or in the admission or rejection of evidence at the trial, to justify reversal.

The next error assigned is that the court refused to receive in evidence a statement made by the conductor of the car, reduced to writing by the President of the Company, the morning after the accident. When the paper was offered in evidence the court asked counsel in what view of the case he thought the evidence competent; to which question, answer was made that the offer of the paper was as a statement made immediately after the accident by a person in performance of his duty. The court did right in refusing to admit the paper in evidence. The conductor was a witness and could have given his version of what was said and done under oath. He might perhaps have used the written statement made through his dictation in his presence, to refresh his memory; but the paper itself was not legal evidence. It was not made under oath and if it turned out that the statement was not true, an indictment for perjury would not lie.

The remaining assignments of error are to the charge of the court. One complaint is that the judge did not charge the jury that if May was guilty of negligence, the verdict should be for the Company. The court did so charge in substance. In his charge the judge said: "In stating the rule that injury resulting from negligence of one in the performance of duty is actionable and must be paid for in damages, an important phase of this rule must be emphasized; and that is, that whenever the plaintiff has himself, in any essential degree, by his own negligence, contributed to the injury there can be no recovery." And again: "If the plaintiff was in the act of boarding a passing car, it failing to stop on his signal, and by that means he became entangled and suffered injury, my instruction to you is, that was an act of contributory negligence in him such as would defeat his recovery." No language could be more emphatic.

In every respect complained of the charge was legally correct, very carefully worded, and stated the case fairly, leaving to the jury to decide upon the conflicting evidence.

The judgment should be affirmed.

MAYOR OF the City of CAMDEN.

*In proceedings for the removal of officers and employees in police departments of cities, under the Act of March 25, 1885, the same formalities are not requisite that have been prescribed for inferior criminal prosecutions. It is sufficient if the directions of the statute are substantially observed.

(Decided August 3, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings removing prosecutor from the office of policeman in Camden. Affirmed.

Argued before Reed and Dixon, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Hendrickson, for prosecutor:

Judge Dillon in his first volume on Municipal Corporations, § 190, declares that "Principle and sound policy require that the implied power of removal for offenses against the corporation be restricted to acts of a serious nature directly affecting the rights and interests of the corporation."

There must be a charge or charges against the officer specifically stated with substantial certainty.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. par. 193; Murdock v. Academy, 12 Pick. 244.

All the facts necessary to support the proceeding must be expressly alleged and not left to be gathered by inference or intendment.

Paley, Summary Conviction, 186; O'Shaughnessy v. McLorinan, 14 Vroom, 418; Keeler v. Milledge, 4 Zab. 144; Handlin ads. State, 1 Harr. (N. J.) 97; Truck v. Dungenbacker, 8 Vroom, 359.

Jurisdiction must appear in the style and title of magistrate, the date and locality of the fact alleged, and more especially in the description of the offense, in the essential parts of which no omission or defect can be supplied by implication.

Paley, Summary Conviction, 193.

Under the laws of New York regulating the removal of a member of the fire department by the commissioners it was held that the written charge required must be such written specification of the offense charged as should enable the accused to prepare for trial.

People v. N. Y. Fire Comrs. 77 N. Y. 153.

And under the charter of New York allowing the mayor to remove heads of departments for cause it was held that the proceeding was judicial and that there must be a definite statement of the charge.

Re Nichols, 6 Abb. N. C. 474.

If the act is criminal and single in its nature so that a conviction or acquittal in the courts of law will necessarily determine the guilt or innocence of the party there must be a conviction, but otherwise there may be a removal without or independent of a conviction.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. par. 189, note 3.

With reference to the charge of gaming it has been held that the charter authorized the council "to dismiss the marshal for malpractice in office, or neglect of duty;" that the council could not remove this officer for the crime of gambling, as this was neither malpractice in office, nor official neglect, within the meaning of the charter.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. par. 184.

The record of proceedings of a city council upon removing an officer for misconduct should state the specific acts complained of sufficiently to show that the council had jurisdiction; no intendment are indulged in favor of the jurisdiction or regularity of the proceedings in such order of removal.

State v. Lupton, 64 Mo. 415.

Messrs. J. Willard Morgan and Thomas B. Harned, for defendant.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This certiorari brings up the action of the Mayor of Camden removing the prosecutor from the office of policeman in that City.

Prior to the passage of the "Act respecting police departments of cities, and regulating the tenure and terms of office of officers and men employed in said departments," approved March 25, 1885, the prosecutor held his office at the pleasure of the mayor; and hence the only subject of inquiry is whether his removal has been effected in accordance with that Act.

The design of the statute is plain. It is not to prescribe any mere form of procedure or to interpose any obstacle in the way of rendering police departments respectable and efficient. It is, on the contrary, to fix substantial safeguards for the purpose of enhancing their value, by preventing interference with them except on a J. J.

proper grounds. It requires, in order to the removal of any officer or employee in such departments, that a cause of complaint should be alleged against him in writing, signed by the person making the charge; that the cause so alleged should be incapacity or misconduct with reference to his official position, nonresidence, or disobedience of some just regulation established for the department; that he should have a fair and public trial upon the charge, after due notice, and with every reasonable opportunity to make defense, before the appropriate municipal authority, and that he should be adjudged guilty of the charge.

The province of this court is simply to see that these rights have been secured. Neither the statute nor the dictates of sound policy warrant our going further. The technical rules that have been judicially adopted with regard to inferior criminal prosecutions are not to be applied to these investigations; for while it is proper that proceedings to deprive persons of common rights for alleged crimes should be confined by somewhat strict limits the removal of incompetent or ill behaved officials, from their exceptional positions of authority and responsibility, should be easy and prompt; and no forms should be requisite which are not in themselves substantial safeguards of justice. Murdock v. Phillip's Academy, 12 Pick. 243; People v. Fire Comrs. 77 N. Y. 153.

In our opinion the prosecutor was charged, in the mode provided by the statute, with conduct unfit for a policeman, forbidden by the rules of the department, and justifying his dismissal; was duly tried upon the charge before the proper municipal authority, and was found guilty upon evidence which, whether weak or strong, formed a rational basis for the judgment against him.

His removal was therefore legal and must be affirmed, with costs.

BOARD OF LICENSE AND Excise of the City of TRENTON.

The Act—Pamph. L. 1880, p. 191—to establish an excise department in cities containing more than 15,000 inhabitants where the power to grant licenses is not vested in a board of excise or court of common pleas, is local and special and therefore unconstitutional.

CERTIORARI to review proceedings of the Trenton City Board of License and Excise in granting a license. Reversed.

Argued before Depue, Dixon and Reed, JJ. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. M. Lanning, for prosecutor:

Prior to the passage of the Act (Pamph. Laws 1880, p. 191), the common council of Trenton had the exclusive right to grant licenses within the City. (See Charter, Pamph. Laws, 1874, p. 843, § 25, ¶ IV, p. 349, § 80.)

The Act of 1880 contravenes article IV, §

VII, ¶ 11 of our State Constitution, which is in these words: "The Legislature shall not pass private, local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties; appointing local offices or commissions to regulate municipal affairs. * * * The Legislature shall pass general laws providing for the cases enumerated in this paragraph," etc.

The Act of 1880 is special and not general, because it applies only to cities containing more than 15,000 inhabitants. Classification by population, for the purpose of determining what cities may have license and excise departments, is not a classification warranted by the Constitution. The Act does not embrace all of the group of objects naturally related to the subject matter of the Act. A classification which excludes Orange from the provisions of the Act, with its 11,000 inhabitants, and includes New Brunswick, with its 16,000 inhabitants, is not a constitutional classification.

Hightstown v. Glenn, 18 Vr. 105; Anderson v. Trenton, 13 Vr. 488; Van Riper v. Parsons, 11 Vr. 9.

The Act is also special and not general, because it excludes all cities in which licenses are granted by a board of excise, or a board of excise commissioners, or by the court of common pleas. The cities containing over 15,000 inhabitants in 1880, were: Camden (where the power to grant license was in common council, see 12 Vr. 495); New Brunswick (where the power was in common council, see Pamph. Laws, 1871, p. 307, § 7); Paterson (where it was in board of aldermen, see Pamph. Laws, 1871, p. 819, ¶ VI); Trenton (where it was in common council, see Pamph. Laws, 1874, p. 343, ¶ IV, and p. 349, § 30); Elizabeth (where it was in board of excise, see Pamph. Laws, 1870, p. 755, § 3, and 17 Vr. 312); Newark (where it was in excise commissioners, see Pamph. Laws, 1875, p. 425); Jersey City (where it was in excise commissioners, see Pamph. Laws, 1878, p. 366); and Hoboken (where, I think, it was in the court of common pleas).

From the eight cities above named, containing over 15,000 inhabitants in 1880, four were subtracted merely because licenses were granted in them by boards of excise, boards of excise commissioners, or the common pleas court. Such an Act is not general, but special. Such classification is not based upon substantial differences.

Hammer v. State, 15 Vr. 670.

The Act of 1880 is special; first, because it arbitrarily selects cities containing more than 15,000 inhabitants from all the cities of the State; and, second, because of the cities thus isolated it absolutely and forever excludes from the provisions of the Act four cities in which licenses are granted by boards of excise, boards of excise commissioners, and the court of common pleas.

It also regulates the internal affairs of cities.

Bingham v. Camden, 11 Vr. 158; Tiger v. Morris Common Pleas, 13 Vr. 632; Leigler v. Gaddis, 15 Vr. 365.

Mr. A. J. Smith, for respondent.

Reed, J. delivered the opinion of the court: This writ brings up the proceedings of the Board of License and Excise of the City of Trenton in granting a license to one James V. Crawford to sell strong spirituous and malt liquors at a certain place in the City of Trenton.

The Board is organized under the provisions of an Act to establish a license and excise department in certain cities (Pamph. Laws, 1880, p. 191).

One of the reasons filed attacks the constitutionality of this Act.

The ground upon which the alleged unconstitutionality was placed was its conflict with that clause of the amended Constitution which proscribes the passage of local or special legislation regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties.

The Act provides that it shall be lawful for any city in this State containing more than 15,000 inhabitants to provide by ordinance for a department to be called the license and excise department.

It then provides for the organization of the board and that the compensation, duties and rules and regulations of the board and the penalties to be inflicted upon those who violate them shall be fixed by ordinance.

It finally contains a proviso that the provisions of the Act shall not apply to any city in which the granting of such license is now vested in a board of excise or excise commissioners, or in any city where the court of common pleas now grants licenses.

This legislation is, in my judgment, clearly special.

There can be no reason suggested why cities with more than 15,000 inhabitants should have a system of granting licenses differing from that of cities with a less population.

In respect to the subject matter of the legislation all cities are a class and an attempt to segregate cities into distinct classes for this purpose by a standard of population is not classification but an arbitrary selection of one or more localities for legislation.

This legislation is in respect to this feature similar to the Act of 1883 providing that in boroughs of the third class the licensing power should be in the courts of common pleas.

The last Act was pronounced unconstitutional in the case of Hightstown v. Glenn, 18 Vr. 105.

The vice of that Act was declared to consist in an attempt to classify municipalities upon the basis of population for the purpose of that legislation.

In both Acts an attempt was made to establish for some municipalities having populations of a certain size a peculiar method of granting licenses.

Each is vicious constitutionally in respect to the local and special character of its provisions.

But the Act is unsound because its operation is further local and special in another particular.

The limitation of its operations is not merely to cities containing more than 15,000 inhabitants but to only those cities of this group in which there was not already a board of excise or excise commissioners, or wherein licenses were not granted by the court of common pleas.

It leaves the City of Elizabeth with a board under an Act differing from this.

It leaves Newark with another board under still another Act, and Jersey City and Camden under boards peculiar to each of those cities.

The intention of those who passed this Act was to take the licensing power from the common councils wherever it had theretofore existed in cities of more than 15,000 inhabitants.

But it is perceived that even if the Act had not attempted to classify by the standard of population, it would yet have left existing certain members of the class with variant methods of exercising the licensing power.

Inasmuch as the granting of licenses is a matter which appertains to all cities, any legislation which deals with the method of granting licenses must apply to all cities or reduce all cities to a uniform system.

Tiger v. Morris Co. Com. Pleas, 18 Vr. 631.

That this legislation is of a character regulating the internal affairs of cities has been repeatedly decided.

The action of the board in granting the license is reversed.

(Decided July 19, 1886.)

ON demurrer to plea to information in the nature of quo warranto to inquire by what warrant defendants organized themselves into a municipal government. Demurrer sustained, with leave to amend.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Vredenburgh, for demurrant:

The practice adopted in this form of inquiry by the State's representative, the Attorney-General, is well settled, both in England and in those of the States which have adopted common-law forms of practice, where the purpose is a judgment of ouster or dissolution.

See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 580, p. 771; § 714, p. 806; § 719, p. 811; 2 Cooley, Blackstone, p. 263; Ang. & Ames, Corp. §§ 731, 734; Rex v. Williams, 1 Burr. 407.

"And it (information in the nature of quo warranto) lies where any new jurisdiction or public trust is executed without authority, though it is no usurpation upon any franchise of the Crown."

Comyn, Dig. Quo. War. A. See also cases State v. Village of Bradford, 32 Vt. 50. People v. Carpenter, 24 N. Y. 86.

The court said in the latter case, p. 88, that the objection, which was that if there was no such town there could be no office, was too technical.

People v. Bank of Niagara, 6 Cow. 196; People v. Van Slyck, 4 Cow. 297; People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 532.

To be a corporation is a franchise. The very existence of a corporation is a franchise, and every act of a corporation affecting the public is the exercise of a franchise.

People v. Geneva College, 5 Wend. 218; People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 883; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 290-294; S. C. 11 Mass. 339. And New Jersey cases: State v. Paterson & H. Turnp. Co. 1 Zab. 9; Atty-Gen. v. Stevens, Saxton, 369; Jersey City Gas Co. v. Dwight, 2 Stew. 250; Nat. Docks v. Cent. R. R. Co. 5 Stew. 755; West Jersey R. Co. v. Cape May R. R. Co. 7 Stew. 184; Atty-Gen. v. Del. & B. B. R. R. Co. 9 Vr. 282.

Blackstone says that the form is, in case of judgment for the King, "for that the party is entitled to no such franchise or hath disused or abused it."

Angell & Ames, in the sections quoted, say that the method of proceeding against those who exercised any public franchise without the King's grant, was in the name and under the direction of the Attorney-General. In the prosecution of this right, he may, of his own authority, and without any application to the court for leave, exhibit any information in the nature of a quo warranto in the Court of King's Bench, against those who assume to act as a corporation, to compel them to show "by what prescription, statute or charter they make title to the franchise; or against an individual who possesses a corporate office, or any other franchise, to compel him to show his right."

In this State this practice is expressly approved. In the case of the Atty-Gen. v. Del. & B. B. R. R. Co. 9 Vr. 286, the court says: "When facts exist which, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, call for quo warranto information, he has the right to present it, without leave asked of anyone."

The information in the Village of Bradford Case, 32 Vt. 50, was brought against it for having usurped the prerogatives and franchises of a municipal corporation within the State, without its grant or permission, and against the individual defendants for having unlawfully, etc., presumed to hold and exercise the offices of such usurping corporation; and there was judgment of dissolution and ouster against all.

The fact that the name of a relator is inserted in this information is one of moment only to the Attorney-General, and for his satisfaction on the question of costs. It is, so far as the court is concerned, "to be considered surplusage."

See People v. Geneva College, 5 Wend. 220; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 298; Rex v. Williams, 1 W. Bl. 98; 1 Burr. 408; 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. 13.

An information for usurping a franchise need show no title in the people to the franchise; but it lies with the defendant to show his warrant for exercising it.

15 Johns. 883, 888.

"They must plead facts, showing on the face of the plea that they have a valid title to the office. The State is not bound to show anything."

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 717, 809.

The further question is raised, under the plaintiff's general demurrer (see People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 532), whether this pleaded law conforms to constitutional restrictions. It is respectfully insisted that it is invalid for two reasons:

First. It is a legislative delegation of power to a voting majority to repeal a law now in force. The tenth section repeals, by necessary implication, the law giving to the inhabitants of the townships all the money raised by tax for roads.

City of Paterson v. Society, etc. 4 Zab. 399.

The vote makes or defeats the law, and thus the people are permitted unlawfully to resume the right, of which they have divested themselves by a written Constitution, to declare by their own direct action what shall be law.

Second. The Act is special in its application. Its privileges are confined to a certain number. A population of 8,100 within an area of two square miles or less, cannot avail themselves of this Act. A population of more than 8,000 are deprived of its benefits. This conflicts with article 4, §§ 7, 11, of amended Constitution. "The Legislature shall not pass private, local or special laws, granting to any corporation, association or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever."

Mr. John H. Stewart, contra.

Beasley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question is whether the plea filed to this information is good.

The information shows that the defendants attempted to organize themselves into a municipal corporation under the Act entitled: "An Act for the Formation of Borough Commissioners," approved March 7, 1882, and the supplement thereto, approved April 17, 1884. These Acts prescribe a certain method to be adopted in the formation of these municipalities, and section 2 of the former Act says "that it shall be the duty of the Chosen Freeholder, * * * of any township in which it is proposed to constitute a borough under this Act, upon presentation to him of a petition for that purpose, setting forth the boundaries of the proposed borough, signed by persons owning at least one tenth in value of the taxable real estate in the limits of the proposed borough, as the same appears upon the assessor's duplicate of the township, to call a special election," etc.

The information in the present case alleges that the petition made use of in the proceeding to incorporate the defendant "was not signed by persons owning at least one tenth in value of the taxable real estate in the limits of the proposed borough as the same appears upon the assessor's duplicate," etc.

In their amended plea, in an apparent endeavor to traverse this averment the defendants say "that the petitioners who signed the petition, etc., were in the year 1884, at the time of the said year when the annual assessments for taxes were made in the Township, etc., the owners of the real estate situated in the then proposed borough limits, which real estate was then assessed to them for taxes thereon as such owners, and that by virtue of such ownership and assessments their several names appear on the duplicate of the assessor of taxes of said Township, etc. in said year A. D. 1884, to the values set opposite their respective names in said duplicate." This traverse is manifestly insufficient. It does not constitute an effective issue. The statute requires that the petition, which is the foundation of the formative procedure, be "signed by persons owning one tenth in value of the taxable real estate in the limits of the proposed borough, as the same appears upon the duplicate." It is clear that the ownership thus referred to signifies an ownership existing at the time of presenting the petition, the evident purpose of the law-makers being to give the right to inaugurate the procedure, requisite to the creation of the corporate body, to a certain specified portion of the inhabitants having a present interest as owners in the district to be embraced in the projected municipality. Such a prerogative could not have rationally been conferred on persons who, having once been possessed of such an interest, had divested themselves of it. And yet it is upon this latter notion that this plea is based, as its allegation is, not that the petitioners at the time of moving in the matter were land owners but that they had been such at the time of the year when the annual assessments for taxes were made, a period that had no relation to the time of presenting their petitions. Such a statement is no answer to the averment of the information that it undertakes to confront.

As the pleadings stand, the relator is entitled to judgment.

With regard to the topic involving the question as to the alleged unconstitutionality of this statute, it suffices to say, that the court does not deem such discussion now in place. The relator has annexed to his demurrer specifications of the grounds on which it was to be tested, and a demurrer in this form cannot, in the practice of the courts of this State, be treated as it was at common law, both as a general and special demurrer, as the latter form of pleading has been abrogated by statute. The consequence is that this must be treated as a general demurrer only, having notice affixed to it assigning the reasons to be urged on its support, and so formal a notification made upon the record must estop the party from departing from it. If a specification had not accompanied the demurrer the defendants would have been entitled, by force of the statute, to demand such specification, which would have conclusively limited the range of objections, and we think that this voluntary proffer of the particulars of exception must have the same effect.

The defendants will be permitted to amend their plea.

Reuben N. DODD et al.

1. Upon the death of the devisee of a specific share of the residue of an estate in the lifetime of the testator, the share devised to such person lapses, but does not sink into the residue; and the testator will be held to have died intestate as to such share.

2. Although a will declares that a certain specific devise is given to the devisee as his full portion of the testator's estate, that provision will not exclude such devisee from the portion which the Law of Descents or the Statute of Distributions gives him in the residue of the estate, as to which the testator dies intestate. So held, where the will containing the provision had disposed of all of the testator's property, and he did not intend to die intestate as to any of it.

3. Where the will contained a devise to the heirs of testator's deceased sister, and one of the children of such sister died in the lifetime of the testator, leaving children, such children will share in the distribution of the devise. The rule in such case is that as to the real estate those take who were the deceased sister's heirs at the death of the testator, and as to the personal estate those who at that time were her next of kin.

BILL for the construction of a will. On final hearing upon bill and answer.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the Chancellor.

Messrs. Whitehead & Condit, for complainants.

Mr. H. M. Barrett, for answering defendant.

Bunyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

James P. Crane, deceased, late of Essex County, by his will dated October 1, 1878, after directing that his debts and funeral expenses be paid, devised a lot of land in Montclair Township in that county, to a church, and then gave to his nephew Moses J. Williams, as his full portion of his estate, a house and lot in Orange for life, with remainder in fee to the devisee's children, subject to the use of part of the premises by the testator's niece Harriet Freeman. He then directed that the balance of his property should be divided equally among his sisters, Sarah B. Crane, Abby Williams, Eveline Dodd, and the heirs of his deceased sisters, Mary Freeman, Elizabeth Ward and Harriet Williams, respectively, making six equal portions; that is to say, one sixth portion to Sarah B. Crane, another to Abby Williams, another to Eveline Dodd, another to the heirs of Mary Freeman, deceased, another to the heirs of Elizabeth Ward, deceased, and another to the heirs of Harriet Williams, deceased; such division to be made at such time and in such manner as his executors should deem fit and proper for the best interest (as it might appear in the judgment of his executors) of his said heirs, with full power thereby granted to the executors to sell and convey or otherwise dispose of the property; and he directed that the disposition made by the executors should be accepted by his heirs as final and without demur on their part. February 20, 1884, the testator made a codicil to the will; but the provisions of it are not material to the decision of the matters submitted. He died February 8, 1886. Sarah B. Crane died unmarried in 1880, and Eveline Dodd died in 1883, leaving three children. The heirs of Mary Freeman are her two children. The heirs of Elizabeth Ward are her four children, and the children of her son Joseph Ward, who died in 1880. The heirs of Harriet Williams are her children, one of whom is the before mentioned Moses J. Williams.

The questions presented are, whether the shares of Sarah Crane and Eveline Dodd, both of whom died before the death of the testator, lapsed; and if they did lapse, whether the testator died intestate as to them, or whether they fell into the residue. If they lapsed and did not sink into the residue, whether Moses J. Williams is entitled to a portion thereof, and whether the children of Joseph Ward represent their parent, and take what would have been his interest in the lapsed shares had he survived the testator.

The will gives to Sarah Crane and Eveline Dodd specific shares of the residue; to each one sixth. By the death of those persons in the lifetime of the testator their shares lapsed. Those shares being parts of the residue did not sink into the residue. A general residuary bequest does not include any part of the residue itself which fails. Hawk. Wills, 42; Garthwaite v. Lewis, 10 C. E. Green, 351.

The testator consequently died intestate as to those shares.

The will declares that the life estate in the house and lot in Orange is given to Moses J. Williams as his full portion of the testator's estate. That gift will not exclude the devisee from the participation which the Law of Descents or the Statute of Distributions gives him in the two shares of the residue of which the testator died intestate. A legatee or devisee will not be deprived, by force of any provision of the will, of the right to which he would be entitled under those statutes or either of them, in property of which the testator died intestate, unless it appears clearly that such was the testator's intention. 2 Redf. Wills, 753; Hand v. Marcy, 1 Stew. 59; Skellenger v. Skellenger, 5 Stew. 659; Nickerson v. Bowly, 8 Met. 424; Davers v. Deves, 3 P. Wms. 40.

A testator may provide that his legatee or devisee, in consideration of the legacy or devise, shall not enjoy such legal right. Such a provision might perhaps be regarded as equivalent to a gift of the property, from which the legatee or devisee is so excluded, to the testator's other heirs or next of kin. If it were not so regarded, the legatee or devisee would be put to his election. In this case the testator did not contemplate dying intestate of any of his property. He disposed of all of it. In making such disposition he declared that the gift to Moses J. Williams was his full portion. But so too he undoubtedly thought, although he did not say so, that the gifts to those to whom he gave the residue were their full portions of his estate; and yet those gifts will not bar those whose shares have not lapsed, from their legal rights as heirs and next of kin in the lapsed shares. Moses J. Williams is entitled to his legal rights in the lapsed shares.

Joseph Ward, son of Elizabeth Ward, deceased, to whose heirs a share of the residue is given by the will, died in the lifetime of the testator, leaving children. The persons who are to take under the gift to "the heirs of Elizabeth Ward, deceased," are, as to real estate, those who were her heirs at the death of the testator; and as to personal estate, those who at that time, were her next of kin. Scudder v. Vanarsdale, 2 Beas. 109.

Joseph Ward's children are within both descriptions. They are persons who at the death of the testator would by law inherit a share of the real estate of Elizabeth Ward, and would be entitled to a share of her personal estate.

SUIT for divorce. Divorce refused.

On petition, answer, supplemental answer and proofs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

See same case in another phase, 8 Cent. Rep. 357; and former suit between same parties, 6 Stew. 583.

Messrs. Theodore Ryerson and Gilbert Collins, for petitioner.

Mr. John W. Bissell, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner sues for a divorce. He charges his wife with having committed adultery with two different men. No direct proof is offered in support of either charge. One is wholly unsupported by proof of any kind; the petitioner has attempted to establish the other by proof of circumstances.

The circumstances relied on would, perhaps, be sufficient to justify a decree of divorce if the evidence produced to establish them could be believed. But the radical infirmity of the petitioner's case lies just there. Looking at the evidence of his witnesses who testify to circumstances leading to the inference of guilt, in connection with the evidence of the defendant and her alleged paramours positively denying, not only all criminal intercourse but that they were ever together at the times and in the places testified to by the petitioner's witnesses, or that at those times they had any personal knowledge of each other, and keeping before my mind also the fact that the petitioner, in his zeal to get rid of his wife, has invoked the aid of at least one infamous person in this case, I am compelled to say that I find it impossible to believe that the testimony of his witnesses is true in any essential part; on the contrary, my conviction is that it is false. A judge in such cases must not allow himself to be duped or misled. He must look at the evidence as other men of discernment would view it, giving credit to what seems to him, in the exercise of a cautious judgment, to be true; and rejecting what seems to him to be improbable and false. The court is never obliged to adjudge that adultery is proved, merely because a witness swears to it or swears to facts from which it must be inferred. To justify such an adjudication the court must be satisfied that the witnesses who swear to the facts showing guilt are honest; that they are not mistaken and that their testimony is true.

All of the petitioner's witnesses who give evidence tending to prove that his wife is an adulteress are persons of questionable character; they either live lewd lives or engage in unlawful practices; they belong to the class of persons whom it is possible to corrupt; and the testimony of every one of them is, in some one or more material respects, improbable and unnatural. One of the persons employed by the petitioner to collect evidence against his wife swears that the petitioner gave him $200 to pay a witness, after the witness had testified that he had had criminal intercourse with the defendant. The person who was to serve as the witness, in this instance, also swears that he made an arrangement with the petitioner to testify that he had committed adultery with the defendant, for which the petitioner was to pay him $200, and that the petitioner placed the money in the hands of his own agent, to be held until he (the witness) had given his evidence, and that it was then to be paid to him; but subsequently becoming satisfied that the defendant was not the person with whom he had had improper relations, he notified the petitioner that he could not perform his part of the contract.

The petitioner denounces this whole story as a wicked fabrication and as without the least shred of truth. It would be extremely difficult to decide which story is true and which is false, for I think it must be regarded as entirely certain that if the petitioner was depraved enough to enter into such an arrangement, he would not hesitate to commit perjury to escape its consequences. This much, however, is free from all doubt; that the person who says he received the $200 was employed by the petitioner to collect evidence against his wife. This person swears that the petitioner employed him to procure false testimony; in other words, to suborn witnesses to commit perjury in swearing that they had had adulterous intercourse with the defendant. He admits that he accepted the employment and tried zealously to accomplish its object. His infamy is confessed. He presents a distressing spectacle of marvelous moral degradation. He did not return the $200 to the petitioner, but appropriated it to his own use. When asked why he had not returned it, he replied: "Because I wasn't a fool." To be honest, even to his associate in crime, would, according to his code of honor, be the height of folly.

*Head notes by VAN FLEET, V. C.

This person, after the first witness he procured for the petitioner failed to come forward and testify as the petitioner expected he would, procured other witnesses for the petitioner, with whom the petitioner and one of his counsel (Mr. Ryerson) had interviews in the City of New York, and who, in such interviews, pretended to have knowledge of facts tending to show the defendant's guilt; and who promised the petitioner to come to New Jersey and testify to them, but afterwards refused to do so unless they were paid considerable sums of money. He was in the petitioner's employ, collecting evidence for a considerable period of time. Now in my judgment, it was impossible for any man of ordinary experience and discernment to require more than a second interview with this man to discern his real character and to see that, if nothing but the truth was desired, he was not the person to send in search of it. If the petitioner employed him originally without exercising the caution usual in such cases and in ignorance of his true character, it is entirely clear that he continued him in his employ after he had learned sufficient concerning him to know that he was utterly untrustworthy and that any evidence he procured would more likely be false than true. This fact naturally breeds deep distrust and leads a cautious mind to look with suspicion upon any evidence produced by the petitioner which does not furnish inherent testimony of its own truth or does not proceed from sources so reliable that it must be believed.

Besides, it must be remembered that this is not the first time the petitioner has unsuccessfully attempted, by the testimony of witnesses of bad character, to procure his marriage to be dissolved. He brought a previous suit, not for the same cause but a like cause. His wife recriminated in that suit as she has in this. A divorce was refused by this court, because the court thought that the proofs showed both parties to be guilty. The petitioner appealed, and the decree of this court was affirmed because, in the language of Chief Justice Beasley, the court of errors and appeals was of opinion that the principal testimony on each side was so untrustworthy, as well on account of the bad character of the witnesses as the great improbability of their narrations, that it was not sufficient for the purpose of founding a conclusion of the guilt of either the husband or the wife of the offense charged. Fuller v. Fuller, 6 Stew. 588.

This language very fitly and forcibly describes the character of the evidence upon which the petitioner's claim to a divorce rests, and also the sources from which it proceeds. A divorce must be refused.

This is all that it would be necessary to say in deciding in this case as between the parties; but as already stated the defendant, in resisting the petitioner's charge, has recriminated, accusing him of the same offense which he charges against her. This accusation necessarily imputes disgraceful conduct to another female. The proofs in support of that accusation have been heard and fully considered, and I feel it to be my duty to say, in justice to the person whose reputation is assailed, that they leave no doubt on my mind that the accusation is without the least foundation in fact, and that she is a pure and virtuous woman.

This is a motion to dismiss the bill for want of equity and for multifariousness; or, if that should fail, to strike out specified parts of it. The suit is brought for relief in respect of the complainant's administration as administrator pendente lite of the estate of Mrs. Caroline Pemberton deceased, late of Monmouth County. The administration became necessary because of the contest over the admission of Mrs. Pemberton's will to probate. The complainant, after his appointment, filed an inventory. The personal property was appraised at $5,884.96. By an arrangement between him and the defendants Caroline, John and Henry Pemberton, the three children of the testatrix, the complainant was put in charge of the real estate during the litigation. That property consisted of three pieces, two in Long Branch and the other in Asbury Park. Only one piece was devised. That was given by the will to Caroline. The testatrix died intestate as to the others. The orphans' court decreed that the will be admitted to probate and directed that the costs and counsel fees (altogether $1,018.64) be paid out of the estate. With the consent and by direction of the three children, the complainant paid the counsel fees, $600, out of the rents in his hands. He paid nearly all of the debts out of the rents and the proceeds of some of the personal property. The children consented to such application of the rents. From the decree of the orphans' court an appeal was taken to the prerogative court. The decree was affirmed with direction that the costs of the appeal, which amounted to $453.88, be paid by the complainant out of the estate. Those costs have not been paid.

There was an appeal from the prerogative court to the court of errors and appeals, by which latter court the decree of the former was affirmed with costs to be paid out of the estate. The bill states that after the complainant had paid the costs in the orphans' court and some of the debts, he was proceeding to sell the personal property to pay the costs of the litigation and the debts, and that then one of the children, Caroline, made a claim upon him for the whole of the personal property except five shares of the stock of a building and loan association, valued at $900, as being her own property and not the property of the testatrix, and threatened suit in case he should sell the property so claimed. He has not sold the property because of that claim and the evidence submitted to him in substantiation thereof.

According to the bill, proceedings in partition were taken in this court to divide the undivided real estate among the three children, which proceedings resulted in the sale of the property. The complainant made application under the rules of the court for so much of the proceeds of the sale as would enable him to pay the debts and the costs of the litigation so paid by him out of the rents, and to pay so much of the costs as is still unpaid. This claim is resisted by John and Henry Pemberton, on the ground that the real estate is not liable for the debts or costs. The application is still pending.

The complainant states that the proceeds of the sale of the undivided property do not amount to enough to pay the costs of the litigation over the will. The complainant made no application to the orphans' court for the sale of land to pay debts, etc., because, until Caroline made claim as before stated, he supposed that the personal estate would be sufficient for the purpose. The complainant appears to be no longer administrator. He styles himself "late administrator pendente lite."

It was said on the argument of this motion that letters testamentary have been issued to Caroline under the will. The bill prays discovery from Caroline as to her title to the personal property claimed by her; that Caroline, John and Henry and the complainant may come to an account in this court in regard to the rents collected by the complainant and the debts, costs and expenses paid by him therefrom; that this court will decree whether the debts, costs and expenses shall be paid out of the devised or the undivided real property; that it may be decreed that the personal property and the devised real estate and the undivided real estate or some of them are liable for the payment of those debts, costs and expenses and the expenses of the complainant's administration; that the devised land may be sold if necessary, to make such payment, and that the account of the complainant's administration may be settled in this court. There is also the prayer for general relief.

It seems from the statements of the bill taken together that the children did not consent that the debts and expenses should be paid out of the rents, but that what they consented to was that the complainant, who was not in funds from the personal estate at the time, might use the rents to pay the debts and expenses upon the understanding that he was to repay them. In other words, they loaned the rents to him as administrator for the purpose of enabling him thus to pay debts and expenses. The substance and merits of the bill are that the complainant having, as administrator, borrowed money to pay the debts and costs, for which the estate was liable, and having paid such debts and costs with the borrowed money, and being now liable to be called upon to repay the loan, and being out of office and the testatrix's title to a great part of the personal estate being denied, so that he is without the means of indemnifying or protecting himself, he calls upon this court for aid and protection in the premises. Under the circumstances he is entitled to such assistance. The litigation in reference to the will having been concluded, his functions as administrator are (with the exception of accounting for what he has received and paying or delivering over whatever, if anything, may appear to remain in his hands to the person or persons pronounced by the court to be entitled thereto for further administration) at an end. Re Graves, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 313; Benson v. Wolf, 14 Vroom, 78.

If he has paid the debts of the estate and the costs of the litigation to an amount exceeding the personal estate of the testatrix, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors against the lands of the testatrix, and may subject the lands in the hands of the heirs and the land in the hands of the devisee, if necessary, to the payment of the money necessary to his reimbursement. Sheld. Sub. § 202; Livingston v. Newkirk, 8 Johns. Ch. 312; Bray v. Neill's, Err. 6 C. E. Green, 843.

Recourse to this court is necessary in this case, not only to obtain equitable subrogation and to marshal the assets, but in order to reach some of them (the proceeds of sale of the undivided lands) which are in this court.

Nor is the bill liable to the objection of multifariousness. The land devised as well as the lands descended were, by agreement of the parties, put into the complainant's hands to be managed by him during the litigation over the will. For want of funds from the personal estate at the time, he, as before stated, with the consent of the children, applied the rents to the payment of the debts and the costs of the litigation, and he is liable to be called to account by the children for those rents. It is proper under the circumstances that the account for such rents and of the disposition thereof be in this court and in this suit, not only because the complainant expended the rents in payment of the debts and costs, thus applying them for the benefit of the estate, in discharging obligations which primarily were chargeable upon the personal estate, but also in order that the respective equitable rights of the parties entitled to the lands (all of whom are before the court) with regard to such application of the rents to the payment of the debts and costs, may be established and enforced. The subject of the rents is not distinct and unconnected with the other matters in the bill but the contrary. The defendants are all of them interested in all the matters which form the subject of the suit, and those matters are all connected with the complainant's administration.

The motion will be denied, with costs.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage where defendant filed a cross bill alleging an agreement that if the defendant would procure certain collateral securities to be executed and delivered to complainant, complainant would execute and deliver to defendant a writing extending the time for payment of a mortgage, and binding himself to accept the principal sum when tendered, and upon such payment to assign the bond and mortgage, etc., it is not necessary in order to compel the delivery of the writing to allege a tender of the amount due on the mortgage.
2. The execution of the written agreement did not depend upon the tender of the money, but upon the tender of the collaterals.

BILL to foreclose a mortgage. On motion to strike out answer and answer by way of cross bill. Denied.

N. J.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George W. Hubbell, for complainant, for motion.

Mr. P. H. Gilhooly, for defendants, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

As may be done under the rules, the defendants have answered, and, in the same answer, claim affirmative relief by way of cross bill. In the answer they set up that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed is not yet due; they declare that there was an agreement extending the time for the payment of the principal sum, first to the 5th of February, 1885, and afterwards to the 5th of February, 1888. The complainant asks to have this part of the answer stricken out, because the question thereby raised has once been adjudicated. It appears that the complainant had filed a bill of complaint to foreclose this same mortgage, prior to the 5th day of February, 1886, and that the defendants answered, setting up various agreements extending the time for the payment of the principal sum; one of which agreements it was alleged was made on the 5th day of February, 1882, and another in the year 1888, each extending the time of payment of the principal sum five years. Replication was filed and the case went to a hearing. It appears, by the conclusions filed, that the court found that the agreement alleged to have been made February 5, 1882, had been made, and that the bill, having been filed before the expiration of the five years was prematurely filed, and was ordered to be dismissed. No other allegation in the answer was considered. As above stated, the present answer sets up and relies upon an agreement made February 5, 1888, extending the period of payment five years from that date and insists that this bill has been prematurely filed.

Can it be said that that question has been considered and determined by the court? I think not. All courts feel it their duty not to hear the same case between the same parties the second time. There must be an end of litigation. But in no sense can it be said that the defendants in this case were heard in the former suit, upon the allegation that the time of payment was extended five years from February 5, 1888. It was not necessary to the disposition of the cause. There may have been and there may not have been evidence upon that branch of the case. The evidence may have been slight and insufficient or abundant, and yet the court may not have considered it, or the court may have considered it and avoided expressing an opinion concerning it; because it reached a conclusion that the bill should be dismissed upon another branch of the case. I am not prepared to say that the question now should be dealt with as one already adjudicated. I am not called upon in this case to declare any rule of law, but by way of reason I may be permitted to say that it would be dangerous indeed to establish it as a principle that in every case when the complainant's bill has been dismissed the defendant is estopped from answering, in another suit, by the same complainant for the same cause, any of the matters of defense which he presented by his answer in the former suit. The mischief of any such doctrine will be discovered upon the slightest reflection. The complainant fails upon this ground.

He moves to strike out so much of the answer as is in the nature of a cross bill, setting up an agreement between the parties, to the effect that if the defendant would procure certain collateral securities to be executed and delivered to the complainant, the complainant would execute and deliver to the defendant a writing extending the time for payment of his mortgage for five years and binding himself to accept of the principal sum whenever tendered, and, upon such payment, to assign his bond and mortgage and all collaterals to any person whom the defendant might designate, and from thence to accept 6 per cent interest instead of 7 per cent; and also to permit the taxes and assessments upon the property to be adjusted according to the convenience of the defendant. He moves to strike this out because the answer by way of cross bill, does not allege a tender of the amount due; insisting that the spirit of the agreement is that the defendant shall first tender the amount due, and that then the complainant is obliged to assign. I think the complainant is very far from a correct conclusion in this respect. The agreement set forth is, that the complainant promised to execute a writing and to deliver it to the defendant containing certain stipulations, not upon the payment of the amount due upon the bond and mortgage, but upon the delivery to the complainant of certain collaterals. It alleges the delivery of the collaterals to the complainant and his neglect and refusal to execute the writing named. The defendant claims the benefit of the writing. I do not think it is an answer to this to say that he has not alleged in his cross bill that he made a tender of the money in order to get the writing. The execution of the written agreement did not depend upon the tender of the money, but upon the tender of the collaterals.

The defendants ask to have this agreement enforced, that is, that the complainant may be compelled to execute the writing which it is alleged he promised to execute. I think the allegation is sufficient to sustain the prayer of the cross bill.

The complainant has failed on both motions. I will advise an order accordingly, with costs.

Amos A. JENKS, Admr. of Lintze VerDuin, et al., Complainants,

Peter BREEN, Exr. of Cornelius Ver Duin, et al.

1. The surviving wife of a testator has no title to his property, except such as devolves upon her by the will; hence personal property, controlled by the husband in his lifetime in business pursuits, belongs to the executor of his estate, and not to her.
2. Where the widow never attempted to establish the will, and neglected to perfect the transmutation of the estate by lawful process, or take any steps to reduce the property to her lawful possession, but took actual possession and control and carried on the business till she died, her administrator can have no better title than she had.

3. Declarations made by her just previous to her death are not admissible to establish title to property, unless made in the presence of the person who afterwards disputes the claim, but at the time acquiesced therein.
4. Creditors of her husband's estate having full knowledge of the facts, who neglect to compel an administration of her husband's estate, but instead (by dealing with her) encourage the confusion which has followed, should suffer any loss which may occur from provoking the uncertainty in the ownership of the property rather than the innocent remaindermen.
5. Her estate should be credited for no more than the amount of debts of her husband which she paid, and his executor should be relieved, to the extent of the proportion of such amount as will be due to the creditors of the wife who were paid by him.

(Filed September 8, 1886.)

BILL to compel a discovery and surrender of assets in the hands of an executor. Decree advised.

The facts are fully stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. T. C. Simonton, Jr., for complainants.

Mr. R. Williams, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

Cornelius Ver Duin died March 3, 1883, in possession of a grocery business, leaving a wife and three sons, one of whom was an infant. He left a last will and testament, in and by which he directed that all his debts should be paid, and in and by which he gave to his wife, the said Lintze, all the remainder of his estate during the term of her natural life, and after her death, he gave the same to his children and to their heirs and assigns forever. He appointed his wife executrix and Peter Breen, one of the defendants, executor. The will is dated December 28, 1876. At the time of his death, he was indebted about the sum of $700. The will was not proved by Mrs. V. nor did she take any steps to reduce the property of her late husband to lawful possession. However, she took possession and carried on the business until she died, April 5, 1884. She had assisted her husband in the management of the concern during his lifetime, and perhaps thereby became well acquainted with it. It was all conducted in her own name. At his death the stock of goods did not exceed $500 in value. But she seems to have acquired a credit and done considerable business. One firm who are complainants sold to her about $2,900 worth of goods, and at the time of her death she was indebted to it $358. She was indebted to others about $475.

One of the defendants, Peter Breen, proved said will after the death of Mrs. V. and took possession of all the goods in the store, valued at about $476, and all the assets which were of

C. Ver Duin at the time of his death, and also $950 in cash, $850 of which was gold. From all this he realized $1,780.71. He still retains possession of all which he has not disbursed in payment of debts and the settlement of the estate. But Mrs. V. left no estate, unless it is to be found in that which the executor of her husband has in his possession. As intimated she left creditors, and they are in pursuit of a portion, if not all, of the assets held by the executor. They procured Mr. Jenks, one of the complainants, to be appointed to administer her estate. He and the complainants who are creditors join in a suit against the executor and pray for a discovery of assets and of expenditures, and that he may be ordered to surrender all moneys and goods to said administrator.

Question: As the case stands who is entitled to possession of the said assets and to administer them? First, to go back: In whom was the title at the time of the death of the husband? It is admitted that he carried on the business in his own name and exercised all the control of an absolute owner up to the time of his death. He obtained a credit in that business and when he died was indebted on account of goods purchased therefor. There is no proof of any act or claim of ownership on the part of Mrs. V. before her husband's death. Everything would seem to indicate that his ownership was not only perfect but undisputed.

Therefore, I must conclude that Mrs. V. had no title except such as devolved upon her by the will of her husband. And as is above stated, this she never attempted to establish, although it secured to her a life interest in all the assets of her husband. Her neglect to perfect the transmutation by lawful process cannot inure to the benefit of others who have not been deceived.

Mrs. V.'s administrator can have no better title than she had. He takes through her. This is plain enough. But the complainants claim that an equity arises in their favor because of these facts: when Mr. V. died he was indebted to several in about $700, and to Crosby & Sons, who are complainants, $233.83. This last sum Mrs. V. paid. She also paid other creditors of Mr. V. The whole amount so paid was $488.88. It is said that with the goods on hand she obtained a credit which otherwise would not have accrued to her.

As to the equity arising out of these simple facts: I think very clearly Mrs. V. was entitled to a credit for the amount of money, $488.88, which she advanced towards the payment of her husband's debts. It was her duty to pay these debts, if she claimed at all under her husband's will. It is true she had not protected herself by clothing herself with the habiliments of a trustee as provided by law; but where no fraud is intended equity will treat such transactions as fiduciary. Therefore the defendant, the executor, must be charged with the $488.88.

These conclusions would seem to dispose of the whole case; but the complainants go beyond a merely equitable claim and insist, as a matter of fact, in strict law that the complainant, administrator, is entitled to the $850 which it is asserted was in the possession of Mrs. V. at her death, and to which she directed attention just before that event. The witness who speaks upon the subject, says:

"I nursed her in her last sickness and was present at the time of her death; a short time before her death, she was looking for her money; I said, What are you doing? I said: Shall I get it for you. She said, Yes. That money is to pay my debts with. Then I took hold of her and helped her in her bed; and as I helped her to her bed and covered her up she was gone; before this happened I did not know she had any money. I afterwards hunted for and found that money. Mr. Breen, the executor, was with me."

This declaration and the alleged fact that she had possession of the money are the grounds upon which the complainants rest their claim. I cannot perceive that such declarations are in any sense admissible or relevant to establish title to property, under such circumstances, unless made in the presence of the person who afterwards disputes the claim, but at the time acquiesces therein. If such testimony is to have the force of proof, then can creditors easily find relief and posterity secure a fortune.

The alleged fact of possession is as feeble in its influence upon the question of title as the dying declaration. She had no more possession of the gold than of the horse, or the household furniture or the store goods. The horse and furniture passed to the executor beyond dispute. The husband and wife during the last years of their lives occupied different beds in different rooms, and the money was found in the room and bed occupied by the husband. This branch of the argument also seems to be against the complainants.

But to go further, there is not the slightest proof to show that the gold was in fact ever Mrs. V.'s. It nowhere appears that she had any estate of her own. Some attempt was made to show that she might have acquired such an estate, but it seems to me that no foundation whatever has been laid for a decree. Nor can I find a sentence in the proofs that would warrant the faintest presumption. It cannot be pretended that she amassed this gold during the thirteen months which she survived her husband in doing a business on a capital of less than $500, and also discharged debts of his to the amount of $488.88.

But again; it is said that these creditors of Mrs. V. gave her credit for goods which have gone into the estate. This is so; but the proof is that the amount of stock on hand at her death was not greatly in excess of the amount bequeathed to her by her husband. If they have contributed anything of value to the estate now in possession of the executor, I have not been able to trace it.

It ought to be observed that these creditors do not and cannot claim under mistake or fraud. They had full knowledge. They dealt with Mr. V. in his lifetime, and had claims against him at the time of his death. They had the law to protect them. They could have compelled an administration upon his assets, and it was their duty to have done so rather than to have encouraged the confusion which has followed. Instead of demanding their rights they allowed Mrs. V. to treat all the assets as her own. Now in the midst of the uncertainty which they have created, if anyone suffers loss, the court will prefer to let it fall on those who joined in provoking the uncertainty, rather than upon the innocent remaindermen.

I can see no reason for giving her estate credit for more than the $488.88, the amount of the debts of her husband which she paid. This indeed may be going a great way, for there is nothing to show that she added to the estate; and it is possible that this $488.88 should be considered as part of the capital fund rather than profits, and therefore her own. Of this sum the executor has already paid on account of the estate of Lintze Ver Duin $309.30, which he paid in ignorance of his duty. Why did he pay her creditors? He was not executor of her estate. It seems to me that the court can only help him to the extent of the proportion of the $488.88 which will be due to the creditors of Mrs. V. to whom he paid the $309.30. I express no opinion as to his right to recover the excess from the persons to whom he made such voluntary payments. Of course if he paid preferred claims, he will be allowed them in full.

I will advise a decree in accordance with these views. Neither party is entitled to costs as against the other.

PENNSYLVANIA.
SUPREME COURT.

APPEAL OF Joseph CHURCH and Charles J. Church, Husband and Minor Son and Heir of Charlotte Church, Deceased.

1. A bill in equity for partition of lands may be maintained by a party holding an equitable title against a party in possession holding the legal title.
2. In a bill in equity against husband and wife to establish title to real estate, and to compel conveyance of the wife's title, a decree ordering a conveyance was made but the wife died without having executed the decree. A bill for partition against the husband and surviving child was sustained and a conveyance ordered.

APPEAL from the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, in equity, decreeing partition and conveyance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the following portion of the opinion of the court below, on exceptions to the master's report, by Archbald, J.:

The plaintiffs by this bill seek partition of certain lands in the possession of the defendants, alleging title in themselves to forty-nine-tieths undivided, the remaining fifty-ninetieths undivided, being owned by Charles Church, one of the defendants in fee, as heir of his mother, Charlotte Church, deceased, subject to the curtesy interest of his father, Joseph Church, the other defendant. The plaintiffs set out their title in brief as follows, to wit: that Thomas Griffin, a common ancestor, was seised of these lands in his lifetime in fee, and by his will devised them to his daughter, Letta Griffin, upon the express trust that at her death she should convey or devise the undivided half thereof to the children of her deceased sister, Charlotte Stevens; that Letta Griffin died March 27, 1867, without having executed this trust, leaving Charlotte Church (one of the children of said Charlotte Stevens) and Joseph Church, her husband, in possession of the land; that said Joseph Church and wife, denying the said trust and claiming to be sole owners of the lands by deed and devise from Letta Griffin, a bill in equity was brought by the other children and heirs of Charlotte Stevens against Charlotte and Joseph Church, to enforce the trust, and it was therein decreed that Mrs. Church held said lands bound by said trust, and she was ordered to convey to the plaintiffs in said bill in fee, eight-eightieths (88/100) undivided, of said lands; that Mrs. Church died July 16, 1880, without having complied with this decree, leaving her husband, Joseph Church, and a minor child, Charles Church, surviving her, and that the plaintiffs in the present suit are substantially the same as in the former suit.

The defendants here (Joseph Church being guardian of his son Charles) in answer, deny the trust in Letta Griffin, admitting the equity proceedings, but denying that they were sufficient to vest any title in the complainants, or to authorize them to obtain a partition, and further setting up that they are seised of the full legal title by virtue of a bona fide purchase for value without notice, in pursuance of which possession was taken in 1867, and continuously held ever since.

From the bill, answer and proofs the master has found the facts substantially as set forth in the plaintiffs' bill.

Having determined the facts, it remains to consider the equitable principles bearing upon the case thus presented.

There is no force in the argument of counsel that, because of defendants' adverse possession and their denial of plaintiffs' title, these proceedings for partition in equity cannot be maintained.

It is true that at law in an action of partition, possession adversely held, for however short a time, will prevent a recovery (Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 193; McMasters v. Carothers, 1 Pa. 325; Florence v. Hopkins, 48 N. Y. 186); for an action of partition cannot be turned into an ejectment nor made the medium of trying titles. Such action is entirely based upon the fact of joint possession.

But the distinction between the principles applicable to partition at law and in equity must be kept in view. Jurisdiction of partition in equity, like other equitable jurisdiction, grew up to supply defects and inadequacies in proceedings for partition at common law.

The proceedings in equity are therefore much more completely remedial; and obstacles, insurmountable in the one case, furnish in the other but occasion for assuming jurisdiction for the very purpose of overcoming them.

It is no permanent obstacle in equity that the title is denied. For if the title in dispute be legal and have not been ascertained at law, the bill is retained until the conflict of titles has been determined by action.

Wilkin v. Wilkin, 1 Johns. Ch. 117.

But if the title in question be equitable, the court at once proceeds to determine it, and then orders partition accordingly. A suit in equity for partition may thus become the medium of settling a disputed equitable title. Thus it is said in Lucas v. King, 2 Stock. (N. J.) 277: "The defendants deny the complainant's title. If the title in dispute is an equitable one, it is the duty of this court to settle it. If it is a legal title, the court may dismiss the bill or may retain the cause and afford the party an opportunity of settling his title at law. * * * I do not understand, however, that the bare denial of the complainant's title is any obstacle to the court's proceedings. The defendant must answer the bill; and if he sets up a title adverse to the complainant or disputes the complainant's title, he must discover his own title or show wherein the complainant's title is defective. If, when the titles are spread before the court upon the pleadings, the court can see that there is no valid legal objection to the complainant's title, there is no reason why the court should not proceed to order the partition."

Again; in Coxe v. Smith, 4 Johns. Ch. 276, it is said: "The first point is, whether the defendant can set up equitable rights in opposition to the legal title and claim partition according to those rights by an answer. When the legal title is disputed and doubtful, the course has been to send the plaintiff to law, to have that title established before he comes here for a partition. * * * But when the question arises upon an equitable title set up on the part of the defendant, this court must decide the title, for equitable titles belong particularly to this court, and the parties cannot be sent to law. * * * In Cartwright v. Pullney, 2 Atk. 880, the plaintiff's supplemental bill for partition was founded on an equitable title, and Lord Hardwicke said he must determine it. Though the objection there was that it was an equitable title, not a legal one, he decreed a partition, and that the trustees in whom the legal title resided should convey. If the plaintiff can come into this court for a partition upon an equitable title, the defendants who are brought here upon such a bill can surely set up such a title, to be recognized and protected upon the partition."

In Hoffman v. Beard, 22 Mich. 59, 64, Judge Christy says: "If the title be an equitable one, or partly equitable and partly legal, the court of equity may very properly try the titles."

And in Deery v. McClintock, 31 Wis. 205, Dixon, Ch. J., says: "The cases in this court where issues of title adversely claimed and asserted have been tried and determined in partition have been only where such title was equitable in its nature, or where some recognized principle of equity jurisprudence was involved, thus making the title a proper subject of cognizance in a court of equity."

So in Story, Eq. Jur. § 684, note 1, 12th ed. it is said: "Where the titles are equitable, or there are equities to settle, a court of equity may be resorted to for that purpose, and will under the same bill decree partition."

See also Obert v. Obert, 2 Stock. 102.

The plaintiffs, therefore, asserting an equitable title, may properly proceed in equity for a partition; and the mere denial of their title, or the assertion of a possession adverse to it, is not sufficient to prevent a decree.

Nor can the defendants prevent the case from proceeding to a decree by setting up a legal title, unless thereby a dispute is made over such title.

The mere fact that, in the assertion of their equities, parties are met by a legal title will not throw the case over for determination by a court of law. Where the distinction between legal and equitable remedies is preserved, the proper forum to decide whether the equitable title shall prevail against the legal is a court of equity and not of law. To remit the case to the latter court would be to shut out the consideration of anything but the legal title which might be perfect in the defendants and yet in a court of equity have to give way. Where the legal title is in dispute between the parties it must go to a court of law, but not otherwise. How, for instance, could these plaintiffs establish their rights in a purely common-law court?

It is no answer that in this State recovery may be had in ejectment upon an equitable title. We are to consider the matter as a question of purely equitable and legal jurisdiction, and not with regard to our own mixed forms.

It is therefore clear that, as against a party in possession of land and holding the legal title, relief for another upon an equitable title must be sought in a court of equity alone, and these equities may be declared in a bill which proceeds at the same time for a partition. It is not necessary to establish them first in an independent suit.

Cf. Coze v. Smith, 4 Johns. Ch. 276.

I have thus considered at length the proper limits of the jurisdiction of partition in equity, where there is an alleged dispute of title. It will be seen that the plaintiffs are clearly within the limits so ascertained. Their title, though in terms disputed, is not even doubtful. It has been fully established and ascertained by the former suit in equity, in Luzerne County. There is no necessity to re-establish it here. It is true they have no conveyance to them of the legal title. But what of that? Even an action of partition may be maintained, where the plaintiff has such an equity as would entitle him to compel a conveyance.

Willing v. Brown, 7 Serg. & R. 467.

How much more, a bill!

The legal title is before the court, and conveyances can be ordered if partition be decreed. There is no need, therefore, for a bill of revivor against the heir. And as for the doctrine of disseisin and descent cast, although it might have to be considered if this were a partition at law, it has no place here.

It is useless to argue, also, that the decree which established in favor of these plaintiffs a trust ex maleficio, arising from the breach of Letta Griffin's promise to her father, overrides the Act of 1856 relating to the conclusiveness after five years of the probate of a devise of lands. That question was considered and set at rest by the supreme court in Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 439, in passing upon this very title.

There may be expressions of opinion by individual judges of that court questioning the soundness of that decision; as by Mr. Justice Gordon in Salter v. Bird, 14 W. N. C. 154, where he says that the case "goes far toward the destruction of a most valuable statute, especially designed for the quieting of titles to real estate." But how can that be made available for the reconsideration of the subject, in a collateral proceeding?

The only serious question is, whether the former suit settled all the matters at issue between these parties in regard to the title to these lands, or whether the defendants may still set up and contest the title, under their deed from Letta Griffin.

Whether or not the learned master is right in holding that the defendants were bound to set up that title in the former suit, and that they are precluded from doing so now, I do not need to consider. There is a more certain ground upon which to base the conclusiveness of the former decree. As the master well says, that suit proceeded, not only for the purpose of declaring the trust in favor of the Stevens children but also of compelling a conveyance. The only object of Mrs. Ruland in joining in the suit was for the latter purpose. Her rights had been settled by her ejectment. When, therefore, the plaintiffs obtained a decree for a conveyance in fee, it bound whatever title Mrs. Church and her husband had. They could not have conveyed a fee and still have a fee in reserve.

If it was intended to reserve for further litigation the title derived by the deed from Letta Griffin (admitting that that could be done), the withdrawal was incomplete. They ought to have had that title excepted out of the decree, and any conveyance which was ordered limited simply to the estate which Mrs. Church acquired by the devise from her Aunt Letta. This was not done, and the decree must now have effect as it stands. It is of no importance that the court decided the case merely on Mrs. Church's position as a volunteer, as devisee under Letta Griffin's will. A former decision must be regarded though it may have proceeded upon an erroneous principle. Bower v. Tallman, 5 Watts & S. 556.

We can only look at the decree, which is for a conveyance in fee absolute. We cannot disturb it, nor refuse to give it effect.

In Peterman v. Huling, 31 Pa. St. 432, 433, where there was a plea of former recovery, it was said by Strong, J.: "The former action, though in form an ejectment, was in substance a bill by a cestui que trust against his trustee to enforce the execution of the trust. The title of Huling, the plaintiff in that case, was purely an equitable one. It rested upon the assertion that Coder and Peterman held the legal title to two tracts of land, one half of which was purchased with his money, and that they held it under an agreement that it should be for the joint use of Coder and Huling. In a court of law, therefore, Huling would have had no case. In England he must have gone into equity and prayed a chancellor to decree a conveyance by the trustee to him.

"The ejectment which he brought was a substitute for such bill in chancery. But if a chancellor had decreed such a conveyance by the trustee to the cestui que trust and enforced his decree, it would have forever estopped Coder and Peterman from denying that Huling was the owner, both legal and equitable, of the one half of the land. Such a decree would have been conclusive upon them in any subsequent suit, or in any other court."

Again, it is said by the same learned justice in Stevens v. Hughes, 31 Pa. St. 381, 387: "It is urged that the former judgment was not upon the same title as that now in controversy. We think it was. But whether it was or not is immaterial. Whatever may be the effect of a verdict and judgment in ejectment, in a second ejectment founded upon a different title it must not be forgotten that a judgment upon a traverse of a plea of liberum tenementum is not an adjudication of any particular right by which a party holds the land, but upon the question whether he has the freehold at all. It certainly would be esteemed no answer to a judgment establishing A's ownership of a horse, that he had asserted his title through a purchase from B, when in truth he had bought from C. The error of the argument is that it assumes that we may go behind the judgment to inquire through what evidence it was obtained."

These cases fully sustain and forcibly illustrate the conclusions arrived at above, and establish the conclusiveness in this suit of the former decree.

But the learned counsel for the defendants contends that their title under the deed could not have been passed upon by the court of Common Pleas of Luzerne County, sitting in equity, because it was a legal title, and being such it could only, by the guaranty of the Constitution, be tried in a court of law, where two verdicts of a jury concurring are required to settle it; and that the former suit in equity was, as to such legal title, coram non judice and void.

The error in this position is readily apparent. That the legal title was in Mrs. Church was not disputed. But it was for the purpose of charging that legal title with an equity, to wit: a trust ex maleficio, that the proceedings in equity were instituted. Mrs. Church's title was legal, whether we take that which she derived by the will or that which she derived by the deed. It is true that in the one case she occupied the position of a mere volunteer, and in the other of a purchaser, and in the latter case, if for value and without notice of the trust, not bound by it. But in either case, the matters relied upon by the plaintiffs were equitable and properly, if not only, determinable in a court of equity. The defendants in the former suit could not prevent their legal title from being drawn into such court for the purpose of charging it with an equity subsisting in these plaintiffs. In fact, when Mrs. Ruland sought to enforce this trust through the medium of an ejectment, it was earnestly contended by Judge Woodward, as counsel for the Churches, that she ought to have gone into the equity courts and not subjected the determination of the case to twelve unlearned chancellors.

Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. St. 432.

And now when that course has been pursued, it hardly lies in the mouth of the same party, by new counsel, to say that only in a common-law court can this matter be determined, because on one side a legal title is relied upon.

If there were legal titles on both sides, or if the dispute were over the legal title, the objection now raised might be good. But it must be constantly borne in mind that the plaintiffs relied solely upon an equity; and that proceedings to enforce this were necessarily equitable, whether pursued in a court of equity or set up in an equitable ejectment.

Moreover, the plea of being a purchaser for value without notice is equitable and not legal in its nature. It is simply the assertion of a superior equity (Cf. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 64 c. 165, 381, 434, 630, 631, 1502, 1503; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 603 to 604 a. 805 to 810, and Williams v. Lambe, 3 Bro. Ch. 264, Perkin's Ed. and note 1) and is, I believe, never heard of in a court of law, except where the distinction between legal and equitable rights has been done away with. At all events, it is a doctrine purely equitable in its origin, being usually invoked as an offset to another equity, or to protect the legal as against an equitable title which would otherwise prevail, and in some cases has been allowed in support of an equitable as against a legal title or demand.

The whole fabric of the argument of defendants' counsel must therefore fall. There is no constitutional barrier against their equity, to wit: the fact, if fact it be, of having paid value without notice, by which Mrs. Church's title under her deed might be supported, being tried and determined in the former equity proceedings. The decree in those proceedings, as we have seen, in effect disposes of her whole title to forty ninetieths of this land, whether held by her by devise or deed, and it being within the power of that court to so ordain, the decree must here and now be recognized and enforced.

The court confirmed the report and referred the case to the same master and two commissioners to make partition between the parties.

The court decreed partition January 26, 1886, and that a deed be made by the defendants within ten days. The appellants took this writ. They assigned for error, inter alia, the action of the court in decreeing partition and the execution of conveyance.

The question is not touched by Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 432, section 7 of said Act not being mentioned.

The defendants being in adverse possession, the partition will not lie.

Messrs. Isaac P. Hand and Henry W. Palmer, for appellees:

We could not object to Letta Griffin's will, except upon the ground that she had devised land which she held in trust for us, which would be no ground for refusing to probate. After five years no one shall contest the validity of a will. So much the Act of April 22, 1856, provides. It does not enact that because no one contests a will within five years, therefore the land thereby devised belonged to the testator, and that the true owner shall be barred forever from asserting his claim. After five years the will is good to convey all the testator had, no more.

In case of a partition founded on a legal or equitable title, joint possession is not essential.

Galbreath v. Galbreath, 5 Watts, 146; Tabler v. Wiseman, 2 Ohio St. 207; Foust v. Moorman, 2 Ind. 17; Barnard v. Pope, 14 Mass. 436.

In Galbreath v. Galbreath, it is said that nothing short of an exclusive perception of profits by one tenant in common for twenty-one years, would justify the court in submitting to a jury to presume an ouster or disseisin for the purpose of defeating an action of partition.

In Marshall v. Crehore, 13 Met. 462, it was held that plaintiffs were entitled to partition, even though actually disseised, provided their title was clear and they had the right of entry.

In Hoffman v. Beard, 22 Mich. 64, it is said: "If the title, though of a legal character, be undisputed, or perhaps, though denied, if it appear to be so clear and incontestable as to admit of no reasonable doubt, and the court can see that a trial at law would be a mere formality, the bill may be maintained."

To the same effect is Obert v. Obert, 12 N. J. Eq. 426; and Davidson v. Thompson, 22 N. J. Eq. 83; Howey v. Goings, 13 Ill. 97-107.

The defendant had, at the time the equity suit was tried, an estate in the land as husband of his wife, (See Bank v. Stauffer, 10 Pa. 399), and was bound to interpose any and all defenses he had against the decree.

Stevens v. Hughes, 7 Casey, 385; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 196); Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 100, 115; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 522; Petersine v. Thomas, 23 Ohio St. 596; Lawrence Sac. Bank v. Stevens, 46 Iowa, 429; Kelly v. Donlin, 70 Ill. 378, 385; Caston v. Perry, 1 Bailey (S. C.) 533.

Says Mr. Justice Field, in Cromwell v. County of Sac: "The judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action. It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them, not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose."

After the decree was made, its conclusiveness is described by Judge Sharswood in Taylor v. Cornelius, 60 Pa. 187, 199: "Whatever question was properly involved in the former suit and might have been then raised and determined is conclusively settled by the decree."

And by Judge Agnew in Bolin v. Connolly, 73 Pa. 336.

Further in contemplation of law we have Church's deed for this land, because as Judge Sharswood says in Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 432: "Such a conveyance will be considered as having been actually made whenever it ought to have been made."

If made, where would Mr. Church get a foothold for an ejectment, in the face of his own conveyance?

Peterman v. Huling, 31 Pa. 433.

Per Curiam:

We have carefully examined the report of the master and the opinion of the court on the exceptions filed. We have considered all the specifications of error. The able opinion of the learned Judge clearly shows that the facts proven maintain the title of the appellees set forth in their bill and entitle them to the partition prayed for and ordered by the decree.

And now, May 31, 1886, with the modification of ordering the deed to be executed and filed in the office of the prothonotary of said county, within twenty days from this date, the decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

1. In partition in equity, besides his part in the land, a tenant in common is entitled to improvements made by him which are reasonably necessary for the proper enjoyment of the land and not injurious to the estate of the other cotenants.
2. A husband who thus improves property in which his wife has an undivided interest is not a stranger or volunteer.
3. The husband of a tenant in common, of coal bearing lands, in a city, built a dwelling house and buildings for mining and selling coal. A bill in equity for partition was filed, after the death of the wife, against the husband and their minor child. On the report of a master, the court determined the undivided interests of the cotenants and decreed that partition should be made. Before commissioners to divide, evidence as to the improvements was received, and the lands containing the improvements were allotted to the husband and minor child at a valuation not including the improvements. Held, proper.

APPPEAL from the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, decreeing partition of real estate in equity. Affirmed.

Thomas Griffin died in 1854, seised of about forty acres of coal bearing land in the City of Scranton, having made a will wherein he devised this land to his daughter, Letta Griffin, relying upon an express promise made by her, by which she undertook and agreed with him that if he would devise the land to her she would hold it during her lifetime and would leave or secure to the children of her deceased sister, Charlotte Stevens, the undivided half thereof. Charlotte Stevens left ten children to survive her, one of them, Charlotte, having married Joseph Church who, in 1864, took possession of the premises at the request of Letta Griffin and, with his family, has lived there ever since. By deed dated February 18, 1867, Letta Griffin conveyed the whole of said tract to Charlotte Church in fee, for the consideration named, $1,000. Letta Griffin died March 20, 1867, having made her last will on September 22, 1862, duly probated April 24, 1867, by which she devised all of said land to Charlotte Church.

On July 26, 1867, several actions of ejectment were brought by some of the heirs of Charlotte Stevens against Joseph Church and wife for this land. On November 15, 1869, there was a verdict for plaintiffs on one of these cases, Ruland and wife, which was affirmed, on writ of error, in 64 Pa. 432.

On November 22, 1871, a bill in equity was filed by all the heirs of Charlotte Stevens, except Charlotte Church, who was the defendant, her husband being joined with her. The bill alleged a trust in Letta Griffin for the children of Charlotte Stevens, and prayed that the defendants might be decreed to execute and deliver to the plaintiffs deeds for their respective interests. The court, after hearing, made a decree accordingly, February 1, 1878.

Charlotte Church died July 17, 1880, without having executed the deed. She left to survive her, Joseph Church, her husband, and a minor child. The other heirs of Charlotte Stevens, or their vendees, then brought a bill for partition. The court appointed W. W. Lathrope, master, who reported that the plaintiffs were entitled to partition, the minor child of Charlotte Church being entitled to the undivided fifty ninetieths, subject to the life estate of Joseph Church, as tenant by the curtesy; the other parties to forty ninetieths, designating them. The court entered a decree accordingly, which was affirmed on appeal.

Church's Appeal, ante, 96.

The same master with two others were appointed commissioners to make partition of the land. It appeared at hearings before the commission that in 1869, 1870 and 1871 Joseph Church built a large brick house on the premises, valued at $19,000. It would also seem, although this fact is not definitely found by the master, that he used this house as a dwelling for his family and that he also built a blacksmith shop and an office for the sale of coal. There was a coal breaker on the premises, in Letta Griffin's lifetime, valued at $2,000.

Joseph Church's lessees added improvements to this to the extent of about $8,000, at the same time opening two veins of coal and mining coal therefrom. Several parties bought lots from the Churches and built dwelling houses on them. The commissioners made one partition of the surface of the land and another division of the coal and minerals underlying the surface, allotting to the plaintiffs, of the surface, four several pieces valued at $10,877.78; and to the defendants eight several pieces valued at $13,597.22; and to the plaintiffs coal and minerals under the surface, two pieces valued at $16,878.69; and to the defendants coal and minerals valued at $20,478.36.

The commissioners, in making the partition, allotted to the defendants the surface on which the improvements made by Joseph Church stand, without taking the value of such improvements into consideration; they allotted to the defendants, in the same way, the tracts sold by the Churches; also, as a portion of their purpart, the surface on which the coal breaker was situate, and in placing a valuation upon this included the value of the breaker at the time of Letta Griffins' death but did not include the value of the improvements made by the lessees. They also allotted, as a part of the defendant's portion, the two veins of coal which had been mined, including, in the valuation, as well the value of the coal mined as of that remaining. On the subject of the improvements, the master reported:

"It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiffs that these improvements belong to all the owners of the land, as appurtenant thereto, and that therefore they should be estimated and appraised as part of the property to be divided, and the division made accordingly. To sustain their position they cite Gregg v. Patterson, 9 Watts & S. 198; Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 238.

"Both these cases were ejectments by one tenant in common against his cotenant in possession; in which it was held that the latter, having put up valuable improvements, could not hold the land until reimbursed a portion of the moneys expended.

"It seems to be well settled that the tenant making improvements without consent of his cotenant cannot compel contribution by his cotenant. But this doctrine does not necessarily settle the question whether, in a partition in a court of equity, it is not just and equitable to assign such improvements to the tenant making them, if his cotenant is not prejudiced thereby. This question does not seem to have been ruled in this State, but the affirmative has been held in the following cases in other States, to wit:

Town v. Needham, 3 Paige, 558; St. Felix v. Rankin, 3 Edw. Ch. 328; Conklin v. Conklin, 3 Sandf. Ch. 65; Brookfield v. Williams, 2 N. J. Eq. 341; Obert v. Obert, 5 N. J. Eq. 397; Hall v. Pidcock, 21 N. J. Eq. 311; Louvalle v. Menard, 6 Ill. (1 Gilm.) 89; Howey v. Goings, 13 Ill. 108; Dean v. O'Meara, 47 Ill. 120; Martindale v. Alexander, 26 Ind. 104.

"See also the following cases referred to in Abbott's U. S. Digest, which seem to be in the same line but to which the master has not had access:

"It has seemed to the master and the commissioners that the improvements made by Joseph Church could be set apart to him and his son, without prejudice to the plaintiffs. The commissioners have therefore allotted to the defendants the surface on which said improvements stand, without taking the value of such improvements into consideration; the valuation of the purpart of the defendants being fixed without reference to such improvements."

The plaintiffs filed the following exception: "The master and commissioners erred in not awarding to plaintiffs four ninths of the improvements put upon the land by Joseph Church or the value thereof." The court dismissed the exception and decreed partition in an opinion by Archbald, J., as follows:

"The learned master fully justifies in his report the course pursued. The subject is also fully considered and the position taken by the master sustained in Freeman Cotenancy & Partition, §§ 509, 510, 511.

"A different case might be presented where one cotenant has undertaken to improve the whole estate as by erecting a building covering the whole of a city lot. But where the improvements are only such as comport with the reasonable and proper enjoyment of the land by the cotenant who has made them, it would seem highly inequitable not to allow them to him in making partition.

"But it is urged that Joseph Church, who made the improvements in question, was a stranger to the title; and again, that the trust declared in Mrs. Church in favor of the plaintiffs was one ex maleficio, arising out of her own wrong, and that so the rule does not apply. Neither of these contentions is sound. Mrs. Church was declared a trustee only as to four ninths, or as it is better expressed, eight eighteenths of the land. The remaining five ninths she held undisputed. Hence arises the tenancy in common, which it is the object of these proceedings to sever. The mere fact that the claim and title of the plaintiffs was contested by her and has been by these defendants should not prevent the latter from now drawing to their share the improvements in question.

"Nor can Joseph Church, as respects these improvements, be treated as a stranger to the title. As husband of his wife, Charlotte Church, he had when they were made, a freehold in the land (Bank v. Stauffer, 10 Pa. St. 399) as well as a curtesy estate initiate, which has now become consummate by her death. Moreover, aside from his own interest in the land, there is no reason why a husband should not for the benefit of his wife improve her land; or why, even in this light, such improvements should be treated as made by a stranger or volunteer."

The plaintiffs took this appeal, assigning as error the action of the court in dismissing their exception and in decreeing partition without allowance for the improvements.

Messrs. Isaac P. Hand and Henry W. Palmer, for appellant:

The improvements were placed on the land after the suits were commenced, in which plaintiffs' title to four ninths was established. Church and his wife enjoyed the rents, issues and profits during a period of eighteen years pending the litigation. They were held by this court to be trustees ex maleficio and, as such, ordered to convey four ninths of the land to the plaintiffs. No reference was made to improvements in that decree, and therefore it covered four ninths of quantity and value of all pertaining to the land described. That decree cannot be impeached or diminished in this proceeding.

In Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 238, it is said: "A joint tenant or tenant in common may not erect buildings or make improvements on the common property without the consent of his cotenant and then claim to hold, until reimbursed, a proportion of the moneys expended. Nor will it alter the case that the cotenant knew that the buildings were being erected and made no objection or opposition."

And in Gregg v. Patterson, 9 Watts & S. 197: "When a tenant in common, in possession of land, erects buildings and makes substantial and valuable improvements thereon, without the consent of the heirs of his cotenant, though done under the impression that he was the sole owner, he cannot claim to be reimbursed one half the cost and expense of such improvements. For this he is without remedy, further than the rents, issues and profits received by him from the property may reimburse him."

In this case these defendants sought, by their own wrongful act, to deprive the plaintiffs of their title and possession. Said Judge Sharswood in Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. St. 432: "They are trustees ex maleficio. If a case can be found in which a trustee was ever allowed for improvements put on the land of his cestui que trust, without consent and against objection, we will surrender the discussion."

If a writ of habere facias possessionem followed his action of ejectment it would put the tenant in common in possession of an undivided interest in the land recovered, including improvements, and if thereafter he would be entitled to share in the rents and profits arising from the land, including the improvements, to the extent of his interest therein, at what time and how does he lose any portion of his right of property by seeking a partition?

The cestui que trust has always his option to take or refuse the benefit or loss of the unauthorized act of his trustee.

In Wykoff v. Wykoff, 3 Watts & S. 486, it is said: "In regard to the second error, we think the evidence offered by the plaintiff in error to prove the value of his improvements was rightly rejected by the court. They were not such as were necessary to the occupation and profitable enjoyment of the land; and hence to allow for such improvements, made by a person standing in the character of a trustee, as the plaintiff in error and his father did, might be in effect to permit the cestui que trust to be improved out of all claim to the land."

"Trustees who are invested with general powers of management will be justified in laying out money in the repair and improvement of the property. * * * But without any general authority or a special power they would run the risk of having payments disallowed, if they ventured to make such an application of trust funds."

Hill, Trustees, *429; Green v. Winter, 1 Johns. Ch. 26.

A trustee, acting without express authority, will not be allowed the expense of pulling down and rebuilding a house.

Hill, Trustees, *571; Bridge v. Brown, 2 Younge & Coll. Ch. 191.

It is an established doctrine that trustees can only be allowed for necessary expenditures.

Fountainaine v. Pellet, 1 Ves. Jr. 387.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was to compel partition of lands in which the appellees held the undivided five ninths. The court decreed partition and awarded to the appellants four ninths of the land. Their complaint now is the refusal of the court to allot to them a proportionate value of the permanent improvements erected on the land by the appellees. It may be conceded that there may be cases of partition in which the improvements should be held to inure to the benefit of all the cotenants. It is well intimated that such might be the case where one cotenant undertakes to improve the whole estate, as by erecting a building covering the whole of a city lot.

Here, however, the improvements appear to have been such only as were reasonably necessary for the proper enjoyment of the land by the cotenant who made them. While the title was in the wife of the appellee, yet he was tenant by curtesy initiate; and, therefore, in making the improvements, presumably for himself and his wife, he cannot be treated as a mere stranger or volunteer.

While a tenant in common is liable to his cotenant for repairs absolutely necessary to buildings already erected and in being, which fall into decay, yet he is not liable to his cotenant for new and permanent buildings which the latter erects thereon. Beatty v. Bordwell, 91 Pa. St. 438; Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 238; Dech's App. 57 Pa. St. 467.

Hence, although the appellees owned the larger share of the land, they were powerless to compel the appellants to contribute towards the improvements. The appellees must either forego the proper use and enjoyment of their estate or else incur the necessary expense to make it productive. They chose to do the latter. The appellants paid nothing towards the improvements and their estate was not injured by the erection thereof. This is a proceeding in equity. Due regard must be had to the equitable rights of each party. Under the facts of this case it would not be a just application of the rules in equity to give to the appellants any share of the value of the permanent improvements made by the appellees only.

BRADFORD OIL CO., Plff. in Err., v.

James E. BLAIR.

1. In an oil lease on royalty, a covenant to use due diligence in operating the premises runs with the land.
2. A covenant in an oil lease to "continue with due diligence and without delay to prosecute the business to success or abandonment, and, if successful, to prosecute the same without interruption for the common benefit of the parties," construed to mean that, in the event of success, exploring and drilling for oil should be continued without interruption, for the common benefit of the parties, as well as gathering and collecting the same.
3. The liability of the defendant under this covenant depends on the question whether or not the defendant violated the covenants to use due diligence, under the circumstances of the case.
4. The measure of damages for the breach of such a covenant is the value of the oil which the lessor should have received, less the cost of producing it and the value of the oil actually received.

5. A memorandum indorsed on a lease, signed by the parties but not dated or under seal, that "it is agreed that the said second parties are not to drill any wells in the barnyard, orchard or garden without consent of first parties, but nobody else to have the right." held inadmissible in an action of covenant on an oil lease.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of McKean County, to review a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of covenant. Affirmed.

At the trial before Brown, P. J., of the Thirty-Seventh Judicial District, specially presiding, the following facts appeared:

On July 17, 1875, the plaintiff leased an oil farm of 154 acres, at one eighth royalty, to one Peck, his heirs and assigns, to whom, by various intervening assignments, the defendant succeeded in April, 1876.

The lease granted the sole right to Peck to bore, explore and dig for oil, etc., and gather and collect the same for the term of twenty years and contained, among other provisions, a covenant on the part of Peck that he would "continue with due diligence and without delay to prosecute the business to success or abandonment; and if successful, to prosecute the same without interruption for the common benefit of the parties." Peck immediately drilled one well and the defendant finished drilling another in August, 1876, each producing about five barrels per day, by pumping.

The defendant afterwards acquired all the surrounding land except that upon one side, drilled no more wells on the Blair farm but operated extensively on the surrounding land. In April, 1877, the plaintiff notified the defendant that the lease had been forfeited by the refusal to comply with the covenant to develop the farm. On April 2, 1877, he brought ejectment, with a writ of estrepement which was afterwards discontinued. On September 6, 1878, a second action of ejectment was brought. In October, 1878, the defendant began drilling a third well, and afterwards several others were drilled.

This action of covenant was brought. The declaration alleged damages sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's failure to continue with due diligence and without delay to prosecute the business of drilling for and producing oil on said premises, without interruption, for their common benefit.

The plaintiff's evidence showed that, to obtain the best results from the farm, one well should have been drilled in every five acres; that with one set of tools a well could be completed every forty days; and that the defendant's wells on the surrounding lands had drained considerable oil from the farm.

The defendant objected to the admission of the lease in evidence, but it was received by the court. The defendant then offered to prove a supplementary contract indorsed upon the lease and signed by the parties, but without date or seals, as follows: "Supplementary. It is agreed that said second parties are not to drill any wells in the barnyard, orchard or garden, without consent of first parties, but nobody else to have the right." This was offered to show a charge made by the parties, materially diminishing the amount of land that was to be drilled upon, and that it charged the covenant declared upon by the plaintiff. The offer was rejected.

The defendant introduced evidence to show that the amount of oil produced by the two wells already in operation in 1876, the character of the soil and the inefficient devices for making oil flow in 1876-8, did not warrant further operations on the farm during that period.

After reviewing the evidence, the court charged as follows:

The duty of interpreting the lease and of defining the obligations its terms impose is exclusively for the court; and your duty as jurors is to take our interpretation as the correct one, and apply the evidence to its meaning as we define it. In the exercise of this duty we say to you that the agreement to prosecute the business for the common benefit of the parties imposes no obligation on the defendant to prosecute the business to any greater extent than could reasonably be done and leave a profit to the defendant. In other words, if the knowledge and skill of persons engaged in the oil producing business and the machinery and appliances then known and the prices of the product were such that the business could not be then carried on with a profit to the defendant after giving to the plaintiff the agreed royalty, then we think the defendant was not bound to prosecute the same to any greater extent than was done; but if it could have been prosecuted profitably to a greater extent to the mutual benefit of the parties, and ought to have been under the circumstances, then the defendant was bound so to prosecute it; and if it has failed must respond in damages.

The consideration of the lease, in part at least, was the agreement to render to Mr. Blair the one eighth of the product; and the stipulations of the lessee as set down in the agreement are, in our opinion, equivalent to a covenant on the part of the lessee and his assigns that they will prosecute the business of boring and exploring for oil and gathering the same in a proper manner and with reasonable diligence to the end that Mr. Blair should have the royalty or income in the contemplation of the parties at the time the agreement was made.

In determining whether the defendant during the time it owned the lease, that is to say from some time in May, 1876, or during the time for which the plaintiff claims it is responsible, from some time in May, 1876, to October, 1878, did prosecute the business in a proper manner and with reasonable diligence, I think it proper to say that you ought not to find against the defendant by reason of its failure to operate the southeasterly part of the farm, unless the evidence satisfies you that such failure was from a want of diligence under the light and knowledge then existing; and in this connection you will call to mind the fact that prior to some time in the fall of 1878, there had been no operations in that immediate locality. You should, in determining the question of whether the defendant has prosecuted the business with reasonable diligence, consider the quality of the land for oil producing purposes as it was then generally known or supposed to be; the cost of production; the price of the product; the knowledge and skill then generally possessed by persons engaged in the business in the locality; and whether the appliances used and the manner of operating was or was not such as men ordinarily skillful in the business usually resorted to in the location and at the time mentioned; and whether the extent of their operations and the vigor of their prosecution was or was not such as was reasonably to be expected under the then existing circumstances.

You must not allow the plaintiff any damages for the price of oil drained or claimed to be drained from the land by reason of operations on the adjoining lands; but inasmuch as what is reasonable diligence is a question to be determined by the light of the then existing circumstances [you may take the operations on the adjoining lands into account so far, and only so far, as they enable you to answer the question whether the defendant was or was not wanting in ordinary diligence]; and we further say that you must not find the defendant wanting in diligence merely from the fact, if it is a fact, that it did not sink an equal or any number of wells opposite or in proximity to wells that were sunk on the adjoining lands and near to the plaintiff's line [the defendant's duty is not to be measured by what was done on the adjoining lands, except so far as what was done bears upon the main question running through this part of the case and which we repeat: Was the defendant, taking all the circumstances including the operations upon the adjoining property, into account, wanting in diligence in its operations upon the plaintiff's land?] I emphasize the injunction, and ask you particularly to bear that in mind, that the duties and obligations of the defendant must not be judged by the light and knowledge obtained after its ownership of the plaintiff's land had ceased, but by such as existed or prevailed during the existence of such ownership; now, so judging, you will ascertain from the evidence whether the defendant did all that it could be reasonably expected to in the business of developing the land and producing the oil therefrom; if it did, your verdict would be for the defendant; if it did not, it should be for the plaintiff, for such amount as will compensate him fairly for the damages he has sustained [and in regard to the measure of damages we instruct you in this way: in case you find that the defendant did not use due diligence in operating plaintiff's premises, you will ascertain, as well as you can from the evidence, how much more oil the plaintiff ought to have received than he actually did receive, and the value of it during the time when it should have been delivered to the plaintiff; and from this you will deduct the cost of producing what he ought to have received at the time and under the circumstances and with the appliances then known; and upon such balance you will compute the interest from the time it ought to have been delivered to the plaintiff down to the present time]; I am not able to lay down to you any more definite rule than this. I am not able to say to you at what conclusion you will arrive from the evidence in this case; as counsel on both sides have said, the question for the jury may be a difficult one. Counsel have commented fully on the evidence, and it is not our purpose to go over it in detail.

I repeat, then, you will find as best you can from the evidence, in case you find that the plaintiff ought to recover, how much more oil he ought to have received than he actually did receive during the time in controversy, and its value; and from that you will deduct the cost of producing out of the ground as near as you can ascertain it, from the evidence, at the time and under the circumstances, and you will strike a balance and on that balance find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The court affirmed the plaintiff's point, which was as follows:

"By the terms of the lease from Blair to Peck, the lessee and the defendant under him, having successfully prosecuted the business of exploring for oil, were then bound to prosecute the business of exploring and drilling for oil and gathering and collecting the same, without interruption, for the common benefit of the parties."

The defendant's points, the answers to which were assigned as error, were as follows:

"Second. The covenant declared on, if construed to relate to the drilling of new wells and the erection of new derricks and buildings, fails to fill the requirements of a covenant running with the land, in that it related to things not in esse at the making of the covenant; and contemplated a depletion and waste of the land and not its preservation, in that it relates to property and the use of property on the land made personal by the terms of the lease, and not any permanent structures or improvement on the land; and is shown by the language used by the parties to have been intended by them only as a personal covenant."

Answer: "We think it is sufficient to say that the covenant on which the plaintiff bases his right to recover is a covenant running with the land."

"Third. The liability of the defendant in this suit, if any, is only on the express covenants declared upon; and if the evidence does not show a violation of these there can be no recovery."

Answer: "If by this point it is meant that there can be no recovery on the covenants to be implied from the language expressly used, it is refused."

"Fifth. Under the pleadings and evidence the plaintiff cannot assert or recover for any alleged breach of covenants by the defendant in not drilling oil wells during the time he was denying its right to so drill, and was by his interference, notices, writs of ejectment and estoppel using every means known to the law to prevent it from drilling and operating the premises in question."

Answer: "We answer this point by saying that so far as the actual prosecution of the work was prevented and suspended by the matters recited in this point, there can be no recovery of damages for the failure to prosecute the work during the time the business was so suspended."

"Seventh. The covenants of the lease in question did not require the defendant, after a well drilled and oil found, to drill any other or additional wells if the defendant, with the knowledge it then possessed, had reason to believe and did believe that it could not drill such additional wells without loss to itself."

Answer: "This point is answered by saying, as we said in the general charge, that the liability of the defendant is dependent upon the question of whether the defendant, taking all the circumstances into account, was or was not wanting in ordinary diligence."

"Eighth. The covenant to prosecute the business without interruption, for the common benefit of both parties, does not define such business to be the drilling of oil wells; and if after two wells were drilled and got to producing they were without interruption pumped and kept producing for the common benefit of both parties, then said covenant was complied with."

"Tenth. The covenant to prosecute the business without interruption does not require the drilling of more than one well at a time, if the drilling and preparation therefor is continuous."

Answer: "This point is answered by repeating that the liability of the defendant depends upon the question of whether, taking all the circumstances into account, the defendant was or was not wanting in ordinary diligence."

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,500 and costs, and judgment was entered accordingly; whereupon the defendant took this writ.

The assignments of error upon which stress was laid related to the portions of the charge enclosed in brackets, the admission of the lease in evidence, the rejection of the indorsement of the case, the affirmance of the plaintiff's point and the answers to the defendant's points above mentioned.

Messrs. C. W. Stone and F. L. Blackmarr, for the plaintiff in error:

The covenant by Peck was strictly personal. It does not name assigns. It is in relation to things, not in esse at the time it was made. It does not run with the land. It does not bind the defendant.

Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. Cas. 187; Cathcart v. Bowman, 5 Pa. St. 819; Herbaugh v. Zentmyer, 2 Rawle, 160; Masury v. Southworth, 9 Ohio St. 346.

If part of the contract was to be received in evidence, the defendant was entitled to have the whole so received.

Stark. Ev. *459.

The fact that the supplemental contract is not under seal, while the original lease is, does not affect it.

Oregon Iron Co.* 14 Wall. 579 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 788); Swain v. Seamens, 9 Wall. 252 (76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 559); Wilpus v. Whitehead, 89 Pa. St. 133; McNish v. Reynolds, 95 Pa. St. 486; Spangler v. Springer, 22 Pa. St. 454; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 804, 805.

It was error to instruct the jury that the covenant to pay a royalty raised an implied covenant to operate the premises with reasonable diligence. Expressum facit cessare tacitum. A party cannot be bound by an implied promise when he has made an express contract as to the same subject matter.

Hawkins v. United States, 96 U. S. 689 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 607); Vanderkarr v. Vanderkarr, 11 Johns. 122; Frost v. Raymond, 2 Cal. 192; Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 201; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 671.

The covenant "if successful to prosecute the same without interruption for the common benefit of the parties aforesaid," superseded any implied covenant that might otherwise have arisen. The defendant was therefore entitled to an unqualified affirmance of its third point. The same error affects the answers to the seventh and tenth points.

This court has already held in construing this lease that the word "operations" is not to be restricted to drilling wells, but means pumping after the wells are drilled.

Blair v. Peck, 1 Pennyp. 250.

Neither should the word "business" be restricted to drilling.

The plaintiff claimed no special damages in the declaration. He used only the most general terms. Therefore he can recover, if anything, only such damages as necessarily resulted from the defendant's default.

His only necessary loss was the interest on the value of the oil, from the time it could have been produced until the time it was produced.

Cherry v. Miller, 1 Pittsb. L. J. 98.

Or, the measure of damages may be the difference between the actual cost of producing the oil, and what he had agreed to pay for producing it, viz.: seven eighths of it.

At all events, evidence tending to establish the actual damage to the plaintiff should have been adduced.

Penn Iron Co. v. Diller, 1 Cent. Rep. 377; Lentz v. Choteau, 42 Pa. 488.

Messrs. B. D. Hamlin, D. H. Jack and Elliott & Watrous, for the defendant in error:

The covenant to operate runs with the land, not because the lessee and his assigns would necessarily, in operating the leased premises, erect temporary structures thereon, but for the reason that the covenant relates to the manner of use and bears relation to the rent to be derived therefrom.

S. bk. 1, L. ed. 104); Fisher's Exrs. v. Lewis, 1 Clark, 422; Jones v. Gundrim, 3 Watts & S. 531.

The lease provides that "said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, are to give to the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, one eighth part of all the oils, salt or other product obtained therefrom." This covenant certainly binds the assigns of Peck; and yet it is of no value to the lessor if he cannot also enforce the covenant to operate the farm without interruption for the common benefit of the parties. The rent which the lease provides for depends upon the manner in which the premises are worked. The lease is to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns.

Per Curiam:

The agreement imposed upon the Company an obligation to use due diligence in operating on the premises. That was necessary for the common benefit of both parties. We do not think damages for not securing flowing oil are to be ascertained exactly as if it were a stationary mineral.

If oil be not utilized at a proper time it may be lost forever by reason of others operating near by. Not so with a stationary mineral. It remains for future development. While there is some difficulty in the way the damages were ascertained in this case, yet no better or more accurate manner is pointed out.

Looking at the whole case, we see no sufficient cause to justify a reversal of the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

William GIBSON, Pff. in Err.,
v.

Joseph H. LENHART, Receiver of the First National Bank of Meadville.

1. The deposit of negotiable railroad bonds, with a bank, as collateral security for a debt, passes the title, as against the bank, notwithstanding the antecedent pledge of the same stock.
2. Delivery to the bank, deposit, is delivery to the pledgee (Gibson v. Lenhart, 101 Pa. 522).
3. Evidence of the antecedent pledge is inadmissible, in an action of replevin against the bank for the bonds, in the absence of mala fides or notice of the pledge on the part of the plaintiff.
4. Where the bonds were deposited in the bank in a package, indorsed with the pledgee's name, the bank is estopped, in an action of replevin for the bonds, from alleging that the bonds in the package are not the original bonds pledged to the plaintiff.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Crawford County, to review a judgment for defendant in an action of replevin for certain railroad bonds, deposited in pledge with the defendant. Reversed.

On the trial before Church, P. J., the following facts appeared: On April 20, 1878, Dr. William Gibson made a loan to William Thorp of $6,674.40, the latter promising to deposit as collateral security $9,000 worth of Shenango & Allegheny Railroad bonds. Subsequently the plaintiff received a certificate, dated May 3, 1878, signed by the cashier of the First National Bank of Meadville, and stating that "William Thorp has this day deposited in this bank $9,000 in bonds of the Shenango & Allegheny Railroad Company, to be held as security for the payment to you of his note for $6,674.40, dated April 20, 1878, due in one year from that date."

William Thorp failed November 12, 1878. Shortly after this the plaintiff called and was informed by the president that the bonds were in the vaults of the bank. At another time he was handed an envelope, on which was indorsed his name, which he examined and returned. He testified that the indorsement on the envelope was: "Dr. William Gibson, $9,000, bonds Shenango & Allegheny R. R. Co."

Lenhart testified on this point: "My impression is now that it was marked 'Dr. Gibson'; but I do not think there was any amount that was in dollars. That is my impression; there may have been, but I do not think there was. I cannot say really positive whether it gave the amount on the back of the package or not; I would not be positive as to that."

A letter signed by the president, dated March 29, 1880, offered to cut off and collect "the April interest of the $9,000, S. & A. bonds held by the bank on account of the Thorp loan; and requested the plaintiff to 'Bring the paper you hold from the bank showing that the bonds were deposited for you by Thorp and for what purpose.' These coupons, to the amount of $815, were collected by the bank; and the money, tied up in a paper, indorsed and put in the envelope with the bonds.

On June 3, 1880, the bank failed and a temporary receiver was appointed, who handed the package to Dr. Gibson. The latter took out the $815 and handed back the package. Joseph H. Lenhart was afterwards appointed Receiver and took possession June 30, 1880.

Replevin for these bonds was issued against Lenhart, Receiver, indicating them by numbers and amounts. On May 7, 1881, they were delivered by the sheriff to the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded non cepit property, and property in another.

On the trial the defendant gave evidence, under objection, that $6,500 of the bonds replevied were pledged, September 21, 1877, to one Berringer for a debt of Thorp and Reynolds, the numbers of the bonds corresponding with those replevied. The receipt of the bank, dated September 21, 1877, with the numbers and amounts, were given in evidence.

The deposition of Thorp was received, in which he testified that these bonds were never deposited as security for Dr. Gibson's loan, that they were not in his package on November 12, 1878, and that he had other bonds of this railroad in the bank, not pledged, on May 3, 1878. The first nine assignments of error were to the admission of this evidence.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"When Dr. Gibson comes to the deposit, namely: this bank, to find out about his bonds, he finds a package which purports to be bonds upon which his name is indorsed. It is not given to him, because he has not this letter or certificate of deposit sent by the bank. He does not get possession of these bonds until he gets possession by the sheriff in the bringing of this suit. To be sure at one time in the bank, in April, 1880, the examiner is understood as handing him the bonds, but he did not take possession; and not until April, 1880, did he even know the number of the bonds; at all events he did not take the number of the bonds until after that time, after the bank had been in the hands of a provisional receiver." Twelfth assignment of error.

One of the plaintiff's points, with the answer of the court was as follows:

Fourth. That the bonds in controversy are negotiable securities; and if they were negotiated to plaintiff as collateral security for a loan of money made by him to Thorp at the time, and he had no knowledge that another than Thorp claimed property in them, then he is a bona fide holder for value in the usual course of business, and the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

Answer. This point is affirmed, but there is evidence that $6,500 of the bonds were not negotiated to the plaintiff for the Thorp loan; if the evidence of Mr. Thorp is believed; and you will note whether there is any evidence contradictory to Mr. Thorp's evidence upon that point.

Verdict for the plaintiff for $2,500 of the bonds; and for the defendant for $6,500 worth. The plaintiff then took this writ.

Messrs. H. L. Richmond and Thomas Roddy, for plaintiff in error:

The possession of the bank was the possession of the plaintiff; and the bonds being negotiable securities, and he the holder for value, he could maintain his right against all the world.

The real controversy in the present case was as to whether the title of Gibson or of Berringer should prevail. As against the latter this suit settles nothing. He was not a party to the proceedings and is not estopped.

In Wells on Replevin, §§ 693, 696, it is stated that in order to entitle a defendant to plead title in a third person, he must connect himself therewith.

In King v. Roberts, 6 Whart. 427, Judge Kennedy held that a carrier, in an action on the case by the consignor, might show that the title to the goods really belonged to a third person who had taken possession thereof. The decision rested upon the plain principle that if the goods did not really belong to the plaintiff he had received no damage; and that he who, by a deceit, had obtained a recognition of his title by the carrier had no right to complain that the rightful owner had received his goods.

Had George Berringer claimed title to the bonds in controversy, and had he made demand of the bank for them, it might have been proper for the court, upon his petition, to have allowed him to become a party defendant; in which case the court could have framed an issue between Berringer and Gibson to decide the question of right between them.

Brooks v. West. Nat. Bank, 16 W. N. C. 298.

Mr. John J. Henderson, for defendant in error:

The question is not whether any bonds were pledged to plaintiff, nor whether he has a right of action against the bank; but whether these particular bonds were pledged as his security, as provided for in his agreement with Thorp. The defendant proved satisfactorily that these bonds were not pledged to plaintiff, and he therefore never had title to them.

In an action of replevin, evidence that another owns the property or has a right superior to the plaintiff will defeat the action.

Seibert v. McHenry, 6 Watts, 308; Quincy v. Hall, 1 Pick. 360.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

It was held when this case was here upon a former writ of error (Gibson v. Lenhart, 101 Pa. 522), that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder for value of the $9,000 of bonds of the Shenango & Allegheny Railroad Company in controversy, and that the possession of the bank was his possession; in other words, that the delivery of the bonds to the bank for the plaintiff was a delivery to him. As the bonds were negotiable and passed by delivery, it would seem clear that the plaintiff's title thereto was good against all the world. That his case miscarried in the court below was manifestly due to errors upon the trial.

The defendant was the bank having the custody of the bonds, or to speak accurately, the receiver appointed by the government to take charge of the assets of the bank after its failure. We have the admission of the bank in the shape of its certificate signed by its duly constituted officers, that they held for account of the plaintiff $9,000 of the bonds of this company. It also appeared that said bonds were in an envelope with the plaintiff's name indorsed thereon; that upon one occasion the coupons were cut off by a bank officer and the proceeds, $815, placed back in the envelope; which sum the receiver afterwards paid to the plaintiff.

The defense now set up is that a portion of these bonds had been previously pledged by Thorp to one Berringer as security for a loan made by the latter to Thorp & Reynolds, and a considerable amount of evidence was received under objection to prove this fact. We are of opinion that all this evidence should have been excluded. There was neither allegation nor proof of any mala fides on the part of the plaintiff; nor that he had any knowledge of such pledge when he made his loan upon the faith of the bonds.

Under such circumstances his title was good, and it will not do for the bank now to set up that the bonds in the package are not the original bonds pledged to the plaintiff. If they are the same bonds, the plaintiff is entitled to recover; and the bank is estopped from alleging that they have been changed in the bundles. We are of opinion that all of the evidence referred to in the first nine specifications of error should have been excluded.

The plaintiff's fourth point should have been affirmed without qualification. There was also plain error in that portion of the charge embraced in the twelfth assignment, in which the learned judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff never had the possession of the bonds until they were delivered to him by the sheriff, upon the writ of replevin. On the contrary, he had the legal possession of them all the time after they had been delivered to the bank, for the possession of the bank was his possession. So much was distinctly said in 101 Pa. 529.

The remaining assignments of error relate to portions of the charge referring to the evidence alluded to; as all this will be excluded on the next trial, a further discussion of it is unnecessary.

We do not pass upon Berringer's rights. He is no party to this record and the judgment does not bind him. It is a question now between the plaintiff and the bank.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Co., the Rochester & Pittsburgh Coal and Iron Co., the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co., the Union Trust Co. of New York, Adrian Iselin and others.

The bill, supported by affidavits, alleged, inter alia, that the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. had claimed (as a consolidated corporation existing under the laws of the States of New York and Pennsylvania by virtue of articles of consolidation and merger dated September 28, 1881, between it, three railroad corporations organized under the laws of New York, and two organized under the laws of Pennsylvania) to own a line of railroad extending from Rochester, New York, to a point about 100 miles within the State of Pennsylvania; that the articles provided for an issue, by the consolidated company, of shares to the amount of $10,000,000, in exchange for the shares of the six consolidating companies, although the aggregate capital of the six companies was only $6,810,000; that after the alleged consolidation the capital stock of the consolidated company was unlawfully increased to $20,000,000; that on the first day of February, 1884, the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. executed to the Union Trust Co. of New York, as trustee, to secure an issue of bonds not exceeding $4,000,000, a mortgage of the entire line of railroad of the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. in the States of New York and Pennsylvania; that the mortgage was recorded in the several counties through which the line passed; that, for default in payment of interest, a bill of foreclosure was filed by the trustee, October 2, 1884, in the Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, and John M. Davy, the referee appointed by decree therein, having ascertained that the amount required to discharge the mortgage debt was $2,056,292.11, sold and conveyed, October 16, 1885, to Adrian Iselin, in consideration of $1,100,000, the entire line of railroad in the States of New York and Pennsylvania; that from the record of the proceedings for foreclosure it appeared due notice, under section 1631 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure, had been filed in the counties of both States in which the line was located; that after the sale the said Iselin had procured the incorporation of the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co., and the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co., the former, under the laws of Pennsylvania and for the purpose of operating a line of road identical in description with so much of the line of the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. as was within the State of Pennsylvania, and the latter under the laws of New York and for the purpose of taking title to so much of the line as was within the State of New York; that under a deed from said Iselin the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co. had taken possession of and was operating all the line of road within the State of Pennsylvania; and that a consolidation of the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co. and the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. was about to be effected.

The bill charged that the foreclosure proceedings were collusive and fraudulently instituted; that the Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, had no jurisdiction to vest title to the line of railroad in the State of Pennsylvania; that the sale to Iselin was ineffectual to pass title to that part of the line, and that therefore the occupation of the line by the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co. was unlawful.

The bill prayed the appointment of a receiver of the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co., and an injunction, temporary until hearing and perpetual thereafter, inter alia restraining the Pittsburgh & State Line R. R. Co. from interfering with the operation of the line of the Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. or consolidating with the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh R. R. Co.

Upon appointing a receiver and granting a preliminary injunction as prayed, MAYER, P. J., after stating the facts, delivered the following opinion:

"Conceding that the increase of the capital stock of the consolidated company was in excess of the amount authorized by the Consolidating Acts of the States of New York and Pennsylvania, and consequently illegal, it does not follow that the consolidated company has no valid or legal existence, or that the validity of such consolidation can be assailed in this collateral proceeding. Its legality can only be questioned by the State, and then only in a direct proceeding instituted for the purpose. Where a corporation has abused its powers or committed acts which are unlawful, it nevertheless continues to exist as a corporate body, until the State or government which created it shall, by a proper proceeding, procure an adjudication and enforce a forfeiture of the charter. But all such proceedings are at the instance and on behalf of the State or government. Ormsby v. Vermont Copper Co. 65 Barb. 360.

"The invalidity of a charter cannot be inquired into collaterally, and least of all by a member who has enjoyed the benefits of its privileges. Dyer v. Walker, 40 Pa. St. 157; Hanover Junc. & S. R. R. Co. v. Haldeman, 82 Pa. St. 36.

"When a charter has actually been granted to certain persons to act as a corporation, and they are actually in the possession and enjoyment of the corporate rights granted, such possession and enjoyment will be held against one who has dealt with them in their corporate character. Ang. Corp. § 80.

"He cannot be permitted to prove, in a collateral proceeding, that a condition precedent to full corporate existence has not been complied with. When there is a de facto corporation, and the State does not interfere, its corporate existence and its ability to contract cannot be questioned. Spahr v. Farmers Bank, 94 Pa. St. 434; Comrs. v. Bolles, 94 U. S. 104 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 46).

"The bill further charges that the bonds issued by the consolidated company, and the mortgage securing the payment of the same, executed and delivered to the Union Trust Company, of New York, and upon which the foreclosure proceedings were had in the Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, were illegal and void, so far as they affected the property of the corporation in the State of Pennsylvania; that the bonds were issued in disregard of article XVI, section 7 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and of the Act of Assembly of April 18, 1874, passed to enforce the provisions of said constitutional article; that the issuing of said bonds and the creation of said mortgage, by reason of the violation of the Constitution and the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, became no lien upon the corporate property in this State; that bonds and mortgages of a corporation are within the term 'indebtedness,' as declared in the Constitution, will hardly be controverted.

"There surely cannot be higher or more dangerous debts as applied to corporations, and they come within the meaning and intention of the law. The manifest purpose of the constitutional provision and the Act of April 18, 1874, was, that the owners of corporate property should be able to exercise some control and supervision over their property and the agents who manage it; and that stockholders should be afforded an opportunity to pass upon the question of mortgaging their property. Thus, by the adoption of this constitutional provision, the State of Pennsylvania has declared a fundamental policy in regard to the increase of the indebtedness of corporations, and prescribed under what restrictions and regulations such indebtedness shall be created.

"It was not claimed on the argument that the requirements of the Constitution of Pennsylvania and the Act of 1874 had been complied with, in the issuing of the bonds and the creation of the mortgage; but it was insisted that although the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company had increased its indebtedness and had issued its bonds and executed the mortgage so as to conflict with the Constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, they do not apply to the acts of the corporation when acting in New York; and that the corporation, having authorized there the issuing of the bonds, and being valid by the laws of that State, they are valid in Pennsylvania.

"I do not assent to the correctness of this position. Although by the terms of the Consolidating Acts of the two States the consolidating corporations are deemed and taken to be one corporation, yet it has no legal existence in either State, except by the laws of that State; and the consolidated company, so far as the regulation and control of its corporate property is concerned, must necessarily be subject to the Constitution and laws of such State, unless such control and supervision have been surrendered; so that when the consolidating corporations became one corporation by the co-operating legislation of the two States, it was subject to all the provisions of the Constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, and 'all the restrictions, disabilities and duties of each of such consolidating corporations.' Vide Consolidation Act of Pennsylvania of 1865.

"The status of a company acting under charters from two States is that of an association incorporated in and by each of the States, and when acting as a corporation in either of the States, it acts under the authority of the charter of the State in which it is then acting, and that only; the legislation of the other State having no operation beyond its territorial limits." Racine R. R. Co. v. Farmers' Trust Co. 49 Ill. 381.

"The new company stands in the same relation to each State as the original company in that State." Delaware R. R. Tr. Case, 18 Wall. 206 (85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 888).

"In Graham v. Boston H. & E. R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 757, in speaking of the consolidation of several railroad companies into one company, under the laws of several States, the court, in its opinion, says: 'In such cases the corporation has a common stock, the same shareholders and officers, the same property and a single organization, and is for most purposes one corporation. But it is a separate corporation in each State so far that it is governed by the laws of each State within its own territory.' Generally speaking, the validity of a contract is to be decided by the law of the place where it is made, unless it is to be performed in another country; in the latter case the contract, as to its validity, nature, obligation and interpretation, is to be governed by the law of the place of performance. Story, Conf. L. §§ 242-280.

"If valid when made it is by the general law of nations, jure gentium, held valid everywhere by tacit or implied consent of the parties. Id. § 252.

"But there is an exception to the rule as to the universal validity of contracts, which is, that no State will recognize or enforce a contract which would be repugnant to its policy or injurious to the rights, the interests, or the convenience of such State or its citizens. Id. § 244.

"This exception results from the consideration that the authority of acts done and contracts made in other States, as well as the laws by which they are regulated, are not proprio vigore of any efficacy beyond the territorial limits of that State; and whatever effect is attributed to them elsewhere is from comity, and not of strict right.

"Whenever a State sufficiently indicates that contracts which derive their validity from its comity are repugnant to its policy or are considered as injurious to its interests, the presumption in favor of its adoption can no longer be made.' Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274).

"No State is bound to recognize and enforce contracts injurious to its own interests or those of its subjects, although valid by the law of the place where made."

"That the recognition and enforcement of the contract made in New York, for the issuing of the bonds and the creation of the mortgage, whereby the rights of stockholders in the corporate property of the company in Pennsylvania would be seriously affected and impaired, is contrary to the policy and interests of this State, is evidenced by the fact that the State has incorporated into its organic law a prohibition against the making of such contracts, unless by complying with the requirements of her constitutional provision and the laws passed to carry it into effect. The corporation, although acting in New York and according to laws of that State and having issued the bonds which are valid there, could not create a debt which would bind the corporate property in Pennsylvania, in violation of its Constitution and laws. It would be in contravention of the policy of this State, as declared in its fundamental law; and such a contract cannot be recognized or enforced here.

"Consequently, the bonds and mortgage are invalid and void, and the rights of the stockholders in the corporate property and franchises of the company in Pennsylvania are unaffected, unless by the foreclosure proceedings had in the Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, these rights have been extinguished by the decree and sale.

"This brings us to the consideration of the legal effect of the decree in that court, and the sale made under it. The Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, has a general jurisdiction, both at law and in equity; and by the Revised Statutes of that State, it is enacted that 'the powers and jurisdiction of the court of chancery are coextensive with the powers and jurisdiction of the court of chancery in England, with the exceptions, additions and limitations created and imposed by the Constitution and laws of this State.'

"Article 4, section 1626 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'In an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real property, if the plaintiff becomes entitled to final judgment, it must direct the sale of the property mortgaged, or of such part thereof as is sufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, the expenses of the sale and the costs of the action.'

"Section 1631 provides: 'The plaintiff must, at least twenty days before a final judgment directing a sale is rendered, file, in the clerk's office of each county where the mortgaged property is situated, a notice of the pendency of the action, as prescribed in section 1670 of this Act, which must specify, in addition to the particulars required by that section, the date of the mortgage, the parties thereto, and the time and place of securing it.'

"Section 1632 provides: 'A conveyance upon a sale made pursuant to a final judgment, in an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real property, vests in the purchaser the same estate, only, that would have vested in the mortgagee if the equity of redemption had been foreclosed. Such a conveyance is as valid as if it was executed by the mortgagor and mortgagee, and is an entire bar against each of them, and against each party to the action who was duly summoned, and every person claiming from, through or under a party, by title accruing after the filing of the notice of the pendency of the action, as prescribed in the last section.'

"That this section only defines the effect of the deed cannot be controverted. It is apparent that the entire proceedings in the court of Monroe County were based upon the statutes of said State, were local in their character, and not intended to have any extraterritorial effect, unless, as is claimed, that portion of the decree which bars the equity of redemption of the mortgagor has that effect. But it will be noticed that it was only 'after filing of notices of the pendency of the action' that the defendant's equity of redemption was barred and foreclosed; and the record shows that this notice was only filed in the counties of the State of New York through which the railroad runs and where the mortgage is recorded, thus indicating that the decree was to have no further force and effect than to bar and foreclose the equity of redemption of the mortgagor in the mortgaged premises in the State of New York. But, aside from this, is the decree of the New York court effective to pass the entire title of the mortgaged premises both in New York and Pennsylvania to the purchaser, and is it conclusive upon the rights of the plaintiffs?

"It is clear that the decree of sale and the deed made in pursuance of it, are ineffective to pass the title of the property in Pennsylvania. In speaking of sales made under a decree of a court of equity in proceedings to foreclose a mortgage, the author of Jones on Mortgages says (Vol. 2, § 1608):

"A sale under a decree of court is in contemplation of law the act of the court. It is made through the instrumentality of some officer designated by statute or appointed by the court. Whatever name be given to this officer, whether master in chancery, referee, trustee, commissioner or sheriff, in making the sale he acts as the agent of the court."

Vide Heyer v. Deaves, 2 Johns. Ch. 154; May-er v. Wick, 15 Ohio St. 548.

"Though a person having the legal title to land in one State may be decreed by a court of equity in another State to convey the land, yet 'neither the decree nor any conveyance by virtue of it, by one not having the title, can operate beyond the jurisdiction of the court.' Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 878).

"A court of chancery, having jurisdiction over the person who has the legal title to lands in another State, may, by a decree, force him to convey to the holder of the equitable title for whom he stands as trustee; but it cannot, by its decree or through a deed of a commissioner, pass that title." Watts v. Waddle, 6 Pet. 889 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 487).

"It is claimed that under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, the decree of the New York court, barring the equity of redemption of the mortgage in the mortgaged premises, is an adjudication of the validity of the bonds and mortgage, conclusive upon the rights of the plaintiffs, and a bar to any proceedings in this State.

"Assuming that the decree was not local in its character and effect, is it conclusive upon these plaintiffs?

"It is established that the decree and judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction of a sister State has the same credit, validity and effect in the courts of another State which it had in the State where it was rendered. But it is as well settled that the inquiry is always open whether the court by which a judgment was rendered had jurisdiction of the person or thing. 'Upon principle,' says Chief Justice Marshall, 'it would seem that the operation of every judgment must depend on the power of the court to render that judgment; or, in other words, on its jurisdiction over the subject matter which it has determined.' Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, 269 (8 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 617).

"Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, after stating the general doctrine established with regard to the conclusive effect of judgments of one State in every other State, says: 'But this does not prevent an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the original judgment was given to pronounce it; or the right of the State itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject matter. The Constitution did not mean to confer (upon the States) a new power of jurisdiction, but simply to regulate the effect of the acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory.' § 1318.

"Want of jurisdiction may be shown either as to the subject matter or the person, or in proceedings in rem, as to the thing." Thomp-

"These authorities fully sustain the position that want of jurisdiction of a court over the subject matter may be shown at any time; and a judgment rendered in the absence of jurisdiction is inoperative and void. The following propositions have been established by repeated decisions: where the subject matter of the suit is strictly local, the jurisdiction of the court depends upon such locality, and can only be exercised in the State where the subject matter is located. In other words, where the subject matter is local, and the suit is brought for the purpose of directly affecting or acting upon the subject matter, and the decree when rendered and the relief when granted would operate directly upon such subject matter and not merely upon the person of the defendant, then the situation of the subject matter determines the proper place for the exercise of the jurisdiction; the jurisdiction can only be exercised in the State where such subject matter is located. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 298 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 311); Miss. & Mo. R. R. v. Ward, 2 Black, 485; Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148 (10 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 181).

"On the other hand, although the subject matter may be local, as for example a tract of land, still, if the object of the suit is to directly deal with and affect the person of the defendant party, and not the subject matter itself, and the decree when rendered and the relief when granted would in fact directly affect and operate upon the person of the defendant only, and would not directly operate upon the subject matter, then the suit may be maintained in any State where the court obtains jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, although the subject matter of the controversy referred to and described in the decree, and ultimately but indirectly affected by the relief granted, may be situated in another State. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 332.

"Under these rules, it cannot be successfully contended that the decree of the New York court, barring the equity of redemption, can have the effect of transferring any title; nor does it determine the validity of the mortgage as to the property of the corporation in this State. To hold a contrary doctrine would be conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of one State to determine in what mode real estate may be disposed of in another State.

"No principle is better established than that the disposition of real estate, whether by deed, descent or by another mode, must be governed by the laws of the State where the land is situated." Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 25 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 878).

"Thus Judge Story declares that 'not only lands but servitudes and easements and other charges on lands, as mortgages and rents and trust estates, are deemed to be, in the sense of the law, immovables, and governed by the lex rei sitæ. The only process by which title can be made to such liens, or the only way by which such liens can be enforced, is that of the situs.' Whart. Conf. of Laws, § 291. 'So, the validity of a mortgage, as a lien on land, is to be determined by the law of the place where the land is situate, although both the parties reside in another State.' Goddard v. Sawyer, 9 Allen, (Mass.) 78.

"In that case both parties resided in the State of New Hampshire; the mortgage was executed there and would have been valid in that State.

"It is true however that the law is modified when the mortgage of land is merely collateral and subsidiary to a personal contract of loan. In such case, while the mortgage or pledge cannot be enforced, or the land touched, except in the court having local jurisdiction, it is otherwise with regard to the contract, which is governed by the law of the place in which such contract has its proper seat. Whart. Conf. Laws, § 292.

But in such case proceedings must be instituted upon the principal indebtedness or personal contract and not upon the collateral.

"It remains to consider the question raised as to the right of these plaintiffs to maintain this bill.

(After citing authorities that one shareholder can maintain such a bill, 18 How. 290 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 385); 55 N. H. 531; 24 Pa. 378; 62 Pa. 218), His Honor proceeded as follows):

"It is alleged in the affidavits presented by the defendants, and not denied in the counter affidavits, that W. H. Olmstead, one of the plaintiffs, accepted one of the bonds and disposed of it, thereby ratifying the act of the corporation in the issuing of the bonds.

"While this might preclude him from questioning the validity of the bonds and mortgage, it would not bar his right as a stockholder to assert a want of title in the purchase of the corporate property under the foreclosure proceedings in the State of New York, and maintain a bill for the protection of his interest as a stockholder in the corporate property in Pennsylvania. What has been said in regard to the validity of the charter of the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company will apply as well to the charter of the Pittsburgh & State Line Railroad Company. The plaintiffs cannot assail its legality in this proceeding. My conclusions upon the whole case are:

"First. That this bill can be maintained by the present plaintiffs, who are stockholders of the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company.

"Second. That the issuing of the bonds and the creation of the mortgage were in contravention of the policy of this State, as declared in its Constitution and the laws passed to enforce it, and are therefore illegal and void; and the lien of the mortgage did not bind the property of the Corporation in Pennsylvania.

"Third. That the proceedings had in the Supreme Court of Monroe County, New York, for the foreclosure of the mortgage, were local in their character and can have no extraterritorial effect.

"Fourth. That the decree of sale and the deed made in pursuance of it are ineffective to pass the title of the corporate property in Pennsylvania to Adrian Iselin, the purchaser, or his vendee, the Pittsburgh & State Line Railroad Company.

"Fifth. That the decree foreclosing the equity of redemption of the mortgagor had only the effect of foreclosing its equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises in the State of New York.

"Sixth. That such decree is not conclusive upon the rights of the plaintiffs, as the courts of the State of New York had no jurisdiction to pass upon the validity of the mortgage as to the property of the Corporation in Pennsylvania.

"Seventh. That, although the issuing of the bonds by the Corporation while acting in the State of New York was a valid corporate act in that State, and could be enforced there, yet such contract, being repugnant to the policy of this State in regard to the increase of "indebtedness" of corporations, cannot be recognized or enforced by the courts of this State; and that the adjudication by the courts of New York State upon the validity of the bonds would not be binding and conclusive upon the courts of this State.

"These conclusions are not in conflict with the principles decided in the cases of Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 207), or McElrath v. Pittsburgh & S. R. Co. 55 Pa. St. 189.

"In neither of these cases was the question raised as to the validity of the mortgage, or the power of the corporation to create it. The corporation having the power to create the mortgage, the title of the property would pass, subject to the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, which could be barred and foreclosed by proper proceedings. But where the power to create a mortgage is wanting, the title would not pass, and there would be no equity of redemption which could be barred or foreclosed."

March 22, 1886, the court entered the following decree:

"First. That pending the final hearing in the cause, Tatlow Jackson be appointed receiver of all the property of the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company in the State of Pennsylvania, including particularly a line of railway beginning at a point on the boundary line between the States of Pennsylvania and New York, and extending thence through the Counties of McKean, Elk, Clearfield and Jefferson for a distance of about 100 miles to a point in the neighborhood of Punxsatawny in said Jefferson County; and also of the stations, depots, yards and other property appurtenant to and used in connection with said line of railway.

"Second. That said receiver shall proceed to operate or make such arrangements for the operation of said line of railway as may be determined to be for the interest of the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, and maintain it as a highway for the transportation of passengers and freight.

"Third. That the defendant, the Pittsburgh & State Line Railroad Company, its officers, agents and employees be enjoined first, until final hearing of the cause, from taking the earnings, income and tolls of the line of railroad hereinbefore mentioned, formerly operated by the Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, or from in any manner interfering with Tatlow Jackson, the receiver hereinbefore mentioned, in taking possession, operating, and taking the earnings, income and tolls of the said line of railway.

"Fourth. That Adrian Iselin and all other persons or corporations claiming under him are enjoined, until final hearing of the cause, from making any claim of right to the possession of or title in said line of railway by virtue of the proceedings taken by the Union Trust Company of New York, for Monroe County, and the sale directed in said proceedings made at Rochester by John H. Davy, referee, on the 16th day of October, 1885.

"Fifth. That the Pittsburgh & State Line Railroad Company be enjoined until the final hearing of the cause, from entering into or ratifying and confirming any agreement with the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, for the consolidation and merger of the property, rights and franchises of said companies.

"Sixth. That all orders heretofore made in the cause be confirmed except so far as modified by the decree now entered."

The appellant took this appeal, assigning for error the action of the court in entering the above decree.

Messrs. Wheeler H. Peckham, Thomas F. Wentworth, E. Greenough Platt, John G. Hall and John G. Johnson, for the appellant:

The New York Supreme Court of Monroe County had jurisdiction of the proceedings for the foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, both in Pennsylvania and New York. The jurisdiction of equity is in personam.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SOCIETY

the State of New York, Respt.,
v.

Alexander H. STEVENS et al., Respts.

Application of a purchaser of real estate in Long Island City on the foreclosure of a mortgage, to be allowed on his purchase money the amount of taxes on the property for the years 1877 to 1885 remaining, unpaid—opposed on the ground that said taxes were illegally assessed, and therefore not valid liens—refused, with liberty to the purchaser to be relieved from his purchase.

APPEAL by the purchaser at a foreclosure sale, from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of the Special Term denying a motion to compel the allowance of taxes and assessments out of the purchase price. Affirmed, with leave, etc.

This was a motion by William T. Byrnes, the purchaser at a sale under a judgment in a foreclosure proceeding, for an order directing a referee, appointed to make such sale, to allow Byrnes, out of the purchase money, the amount of certain alleged taxes and assessments remaining due and unpaid on the premises. On the hearing of the motion, the court appointed George B. Newell, Esq., referee to take proofs of all taxes and assessments which were valid liens and incumbrances on the premises at the time of the sale. The referee found that the alleged taxes and assessments were not valid liens or incumbrances. His report was confirmed by the special term May 5, 1886, and an order entered that the motion of William T. Byrnes be denied. On appeal to the general term this order was affirmed and Byrnes appealed to this court. The facts appear from the following

Opinion of the Referee:

The property in question is situated in the fourth ward of Long Island City, and upon it a mortgage was made to the plaintiffs December 5, 1877.

The plaintiff has brought this action to foreclose the mortgage, has obtained judgment, and under that judgment sale was had January 9, 1886. On that sale William T. Byrnes became the purchaser, for the sum of $18,800; and signed certain terms of sale which provided in substance that out of the proceeds of the sale the referee should allow all taxes and assessments which were valid liens and incumbrances upon the property at the time of sale.

Certain taxes appearing of record against the property, the purchaser made a motion to compel the referee to allow them out of the proceeds. The defendant Alexa C. Bowden and the plaintiffs opposed the motion, upon the ground that the taxes were not valid liens or incumbrances for various reasons; and it was referred to me to take testimony in respect to such taxes and to report my opinion thereon.

The facts as they appear from the evidence before me are as follows:

It appears from the assessment rolls of Long Island City, that city, ward, state and county taxes for the years 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885 were levied upon the property in question and are still unpaid.

The defendant, Alexa C. Bowden, and the plaintiffs claim that none of those taxes were valid liens and incumbrances upon the property, for the following several reasons, which I find from the testimony to be the facts:

1. That the assessment rolls of said city for the years 1877, 1878 and 1879 were not verified by the assessors in the manner provided by law.

2. That the assessors of the city intentionally omitted from assessment in the years 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885, a large amount of real property, amounting to about 270 acres or over, and such property was not taxed in said years.

3. That such property was fraudulently omitted from assessment and taxation by said assessors.

4. That the assessors of said city for the years 1882 and 1883 agreed and resolved to assess no personal property in said city, nor any residents of said city for personal property owned by them.

5. That two of the assessors of said city for the year 1881 fraudulently prevented the third assessor from taking any part in the assessment of the property in the first and second wards of said city in said year, and fraudulently prevented him from voting upon the amounts of such assessments.

Upon the part of the purchaser it is urged that all defects, if any, in the levying and assessment of the said taxes have been cured and the taxes in all things confirmed by section 18 of chapter 883 of the Laws of 1882.

It will be convenient to first dispose of the question thus raised by the purchaser. In my opinion chapter 883 of the Laws of 1882 does not affect or confirm the taxes in question.

It is needless to discuss how far the Act intended to or could validate the taxes in question in respect to the alleged defects. It is enough that the property comes directly within the exception provided by the Act itself. It was mortgaged in 1877, several years before the passage of the Act; and the Act expressly provides that taxes upon property so mortgaged shall not be affected, validated, levied or confirmed by the Act. Chapter 883, Laws 1882, § 20.

It may be true that the section of the Act (§ 20) was not intended to be so sweeping. I am not at liberty to determine the intention, except from the words; and there is no ambiguity in the words. I am obliged to find the fact in the very words of the exception itself; and it would be a strange process of reasoning which should determine those words to mean one thing in the Act and another thing in the finding.

Moreover, it seems to me plain that this is the very case intended. If these taxes were invalid, the mortgagee would not dare pay them; nor could he, under the covenant contained in the mortgage, foreclose because of their non-payment. To validate all these taxes would be a gross injustice to the mortgagee, even if it did not impair the obligations of the covenant, and it is not strange that the Legislature refused to do it. The case to which my attention has been called, the case of Francklyn v. Long Island City, 32 Hun. 451, is not in point. That case was an action to set aside taxes as a cloud upon title. The Act of 1882 (§ 18) expressly forbids this; and it may be true that the exception does not relate to that prohibition. See Id. § 20.

Moreover, the plaintiff in that case failed to bring herself within the terms of this exception. She had filed no affidavit, as provided in the section referred to.

Thus the question of the validity of these taxes must be considered upon the claims made and proved by the defendant Alexa C. Bowden and the plaintiff.

It is my opinion that the taxes for 1877, 1878 and 1879 are void upon their face, for the reason that the assessors did not verify the rolls, as required by law. Laws 1851, chap. 176, § 8; Charter of Long Island City, chap. 461; Laws 1871, title VI, § 6; Hinckley v. Cooper, 22 Hun, 253; Westfall v. Preston, 49 N. Y. 349.

There is no jurisdiction to issue a warrant where the assessment roll is not verified in the manner and at the time prescribed by law. Westfall v. Preston, supra.

From the year 1877 to the year 1885, both inclusive, the assessors omitted from the assessment rolls a considerable amount of real property, 270 acres or more. This property is not exempt by the general statute or by the charter of the city which adopts the statute. R. S. chap. XIII, part I, title I; Laws 1871, chap. 461, title VI, § 33.

It has never and does not now belong to Long Island City. Charter, § 33.

It is urged that this property is designated upon the city map and upon the assessment maps as streets and parks, and is therefore not taxable. But it is not owned by the city and it will not be owned by it until, on petition of its present owners, proceedings shall be taken for the opening and laying out of the designated streets and parks, and the awards made for this property shall be paid; and those awards will be the true value of the property as though it were not so designated. There is no provision in the statute or in the charter which exempts such property. There is no reason why it should be exempted. It is in the possession, occupation and enjoyment of private persons; and if it be taken for a street they will receive its full value. Any other piece of property not so designated is subject to be taken for a like purpose by Act of the Legislature; and there is no reason why the property designated should escape the burden of taxation for that reason.

But the officials of the city have not consistently maintained such a position; for certain of the designated property, notably the piece called "Ravenswood Park," was taxed during all the years; and some other of it, "Astoria Park," "Washington Hall," etc., was taxed in some years and omitted in others. In fact, the assessors of the city acted upon arbitrary and personal preference, without warrant of law; and in my opinion, the facts prove a case of undoubted fraud.

It has been declared to be settled law in this State that the omission of taxable property vitiates a tax. Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. 528, and op. of Miller, J., at pp. 536, 537; Re Protestant Episcopal School, 75 N. Y. 324.

An omission of property from fraud would certainly vitiate a tax; for the property assessed is assessed with knowledge that it will have to bear more than its just share of the public burden and with a fraudulent design that it should be so; hence, the very assessments in question were fraudulently made. There can be no doubt that such assessment or any tax levied thereon is invalid.

It cannot be said that the omission was a trifling one. It could not, in any event be presumed that it was without evidence to establish the fact; and it seems to me plain that the omission from assessment of 270 acres of property in a small city is not a trifling but a substantial omission. My opinion, then, is that all the taxes from 1877 to 1885, both inclusive, are invalid on this account.

The other specific objection made in respect to the taxes for 1882 and 1883 is founded upon a wrong of so gross a character that I deem it proper to direct attention to it. The boards of assessors for these years deliberately agreed to assess no one for personal property, to make no assessment on personal property whatever. This was a deliberate agreement to make no effort to comply with the provisions of the general statute and of the charter, which expressly declares it to be their duty "to ascertain, by diligent inquiry, the names of all the taxable inhabitants in the respective wards of said city; and also the taxable property, real or personal, within the same." Chapter 461, Laws 1871, title VI, § 4.

Yet after making the roll they made the statutory affidavit, in which they declare that the roll contains a true statement of the aggregate amount of taxable estate of each and every person named in such roll, etc., according to their best judgment and belief; and this in the face of their agreement that, whatever their judgment or belief, they would not put in the roll any statement of personal property whatever. This affidavit was deliberately false and fraudulent; and any such attempt to make a bad tax good must be wholly ineffectual.

This gross misconstruction of the law and willful violation of it affects every inhabitant taxable for personal estate within the city, and shifts the entire burden of taxation upon one kind of property. In my opinion it vitiates the whole levy of taxes for those years.

It has been and should be the policy of the courts to uphold the validity of taxes as the necessary means of existence of all government—even that of the courts themselves. But I apprehend that this policy is not and is not intended to be extended to cases where the defects alleged are more than irregularities of form or in procedure; and that where a case of fraud or of actual injustice is made out, the courts should and would have as little hesitation in providing the appropriate remedy as they would have in any other case of a like wrong, but connected with a different subject.

I therefore feel constrained to say that it is my opinion that none of the taxes imposed upon the said premises from the year 1877 to the year 1885, both inclusive, were valid liens or incumbrances upon the said premises on the 9th day of January, 1886. Since I have arrived at this conclusion upon the grounds stated, the other claims urged by the plaintiff and the defendant Bowden need not be considered.

Mr. Percival J. Parris, for appellant:

The failure to make affidavit to the rolls, which is the defect alleged in respect to the taxes for 1877, 1878 and 1879, was a mere irregularity, a matter of form, which the Legislature had prescribed in the first instance and which it had the power to dispense with at any time. This the Legislature did.

Chapter 883 of the Laws of 1882 cures all the alleged defects in the city and ward taxes for the years 1877 to 1882, both inclusive.

"Where there was municipal jurisdiction of the subject matter and the defects in the exercise of it are irregularities in the mode of procedure, it is within the legislative discretion to adopt and confirm the result of the informal act."

Tift v. Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 211.

The taxes for 1877, 1878 and 1879 were not invalid on account of the omission to verify the rolls. The failure to verify the rolls is a mere irregularity which will not invalidate the tax.

The case of Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517, was substantially overruled by the case of Parish v. Golden, 85 N. Y. 462.

The omission of real property did not invalidate the taxes. All the cases which the respondents cite to sustain this position are cases of assessments for public improvements. Assessors of taxes have much larger powers than those assessing for improvements. The officers themselves may be liable for misconduct, but their conduct cannot prevent the recovery of the taxes.

Dunham v. Chicago, 55 Ill. 357.

Messrs. Varnum & Harrison, for plaintiff, respondent:

I. The taxes for 1877, 1878 and 1879 were void upon the record, as no affidavit was written upon the rolls or made by the assessors, as required by law. This is an indispensable requirement.

Laws 1851, chap. 176, § 8; Westfall v. Preston, 49 N. Y. 349; Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517.

The common council had no jurisdiction to confirm the tax or to issue a warrant; and the collector would be a trespasser if he should attempt to make a levy.

See cases cited supra.

II. The taxes for 1882 and 1883 were void because of the agreement made by the assessors that they would assess no personal property.

Laws 1871, chap. 461, title VI, § 4.

III. The taxes for the years above stated, and those for the years 1880, 1881, 1884 and 1885 were invalid, because the assessors did not assess 270 acres or more of taxable real estate. The omitted property was not exempt because it was designated on the city map as streets and parks. There is no such provision of law.

Laws, 1871, chap. 461, title IV, § 83; R. S. chap. XIII, part I, title I.

It is the rule in this State that the omission of part of the property liable to taxation makes the tax invalid.

Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. 528, and see cases cited.

In the absence of proof to the contrary it must be assumed that the omission is of a substantial character.

Id. 587.

Mr. Cecil Campbell Higgins, for Alexa C. Bowden, respondent:

I. Chapter 883, Laws of 1882, does not confirm or validate the city and ward taxes for 1877 to 1882, both inclusive. It does not affect them at all. Section 18 of the said Act confirms taxes theretofore laid and levied for city and ward purposes in said city, "except as herein otherwise provided." Section 20 provides: "Nor shall anything in this Act be construed to affect, validate, levy or confirm any assessment upon any lot or parcel of land which has been mortgaged."

II. The taxes for 1877, 1878 and 1879 are invalid, because the assessors did not make or attach to the assessment rolls the affidavit required by law. If the assessors fail to do this the assessment is wholly void. It gives no jurisdiction to any officer to levy a tax or issue a warrant for its collection.

Hinckley v. Cooper, 22 Hun. 858; Westfall v. Preston, 49 N. Y. 349; Van Rensselaer v. Witbeck, 7 N. Y. 517.

III. The taxes for all the years 1877 to 1885, both inclusive, are made invalid by the omission of taxable real property.

Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. 528; Re Protestant Episcopal School, 75 N. Y. 824; Casey v. Mayor, 5 Hun. 463; Hersey v. Supervisors of Milwaukee Co. 16 Wis. 185; Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 242.

It is of no importance that the property omitted was designated on the city map and on the assessment maps as streets and parks. This property was taxable and the assessors were bound to assess it. They have no discretion to omit taxable property.

Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. op. of Miller, J., 586.

IV. The act of the assessors in omitting to tax personal property was a willful violation or a gross misconstruction of the law. It affects every taxable inhabitant of Long Island City. It seems hardly necessary to discuss whether this will vitiate a tax.

v.

1. Where a lessee assigns his whole estate, without reserving any reversion therein in himself, a privity of estate is at once created between his assignee and the original lessor, and the latter has a right of action directly against the assignee on the covenant to pay rent, or any other covenant in the lease which runs with the land; but if the lessee sublets the premises, reserving or retaining any such reversion, however small, the privity of the estate is not established and the original lessor has no right of action against the sublessee, there being neither privity of contract nor of estate between them.

2. As between the transferee of a lease and the original landlord, the rule is settled that if the lessee parts with his whole term or interest as lessee, or makes a lease for a period exceeding his whole term, it will, as to the landlord, amount to an assignment of the lease; and the essence of the instrument as an assignment, so far as the original landlord is concerned, will not be destroyed by its reserving a new rent to the assignor with a power of re-entry for nonpayment, nor by its assuming the character of a sublease; and the assignee, so long as he continues to hold the estate, is liable directly to the original landlord on all covenants in the original lease which run with the land, including the covenant to pay rent.
3. But as between the original lessee and his lessee or transferee, even though the original lessee demises his whole term, if the parties intend a lease, the relation of landlord and tenant, as to all but strict reversionary rights, will arise between them.
4. Hence, where an assignee of a lease of a railroad for fifty years, together with the right of purchase of the fee at the end of the term, leased the road to defendant for ninety-nine years, reserving a different rent from that in the original lease, with a provision for re-entry but without an assignment of the right of purchase, and the defendant covenanted to surrender the premises at the end of the ninety-nine years, to its immediate lessor, the instrument to defendant operated, as between the defendant and the original landlord, as an assignment of the term of fifty years, and during such term there was a privity of estate between defendant and the original landlord, and the legal estate in reversion was in the original landlord during the fifty years; and he or those succeeding to his estate were both legally and equitably entitled to the rents and had a right of action therefor directly against defendant.
5. An estate to arise in futuro cannot be tacked on to the estate of a lessee who has assigned his whole term, so as to create a reversion in him and establish the relation of landlord and tenant between such lessee and the person to whom he has assigned his term, so far as strictly reversionary rights are concerned, or prevent that relation from existing between such person and the original landlord.

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings County Special Term, dismissing, upon the merits, a complaint in an action to recover rent. Reversed.

The action was brought by plaintiff, claiming as devisee of her late husband, Alexander T. Stewart, against the defendant as assignee of a certain lease made by said Alexander T. Stewart. In January, 1873, Alexander T. Stewart leased, to the Central Railroad Company of Long Island, a railroad built by him, running from his Hempstead Plains property to Farmingdale, for the term of fifty years, at a fixed yearly rental, payable quarterly.

In June, 1874, the Central Railroad Company consolidated with the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, and to it the Stewart contract or lease was assigned.

In May, 1876, the latter railroad company made the contract with the defendant under which the defendant took possession of the Stewart railroad, the legal effect of which contract is here in question. The defendant claims that this contract created it an under tenant of the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, while the plaintiff claims that defendant holds as assignee of the lease. The terms of lease and contract in question are set forth in the dissenting opinion by Finch, J., at page 122, post.

Mr. Samuel Hand, with Messrs. Work & McNamee, for appellant:

I. The relation between Stewart and the Central Railroad Company was that of landlord and tenant. The fact that there was no rent, strictly speaking, but only an agreement to pay interest on purchase money is not important.

Folden v. State, 18 Neb. 828; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 292.

II. The instrument between the Flushing, N. S. & C. R. R. Co. to the defendant is in effect an assignment of the Stewart lease. The general rule is that the transfer of an entire term is an assignment and not a sublease.

Chihls v. Clark, 3 Barb. Ch. 59; Van Rensselaer's Exrs. v. Gallup, 5 Denio, 460; Bagley v. Freeman, 1 Hilt. 196; Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 457; Davis v. Morris, 36 N. Y. 569; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 991; Toule v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 819.

There is nothing in any of the cases in this State which prevents the application of the rule stated, to the instrument between the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, and the defendant. In all of the following cases there was a reversion in the original lessee.

Piggot v. Mason, 1 Paige, 412; People v. Robertson, 39 Barb. 9; Post v. Kearney, 2 N. Y. 394; Collins v. Hasbrouck, 56 N. Y. 157; Gapson v. Tift, 71 N. Y. 48; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 991. See also Detroit Savings Bank v. Bellamy, 49 Mich. 817; Wood, Land. & T. 82; 2 Prest. Con. 134; Archibald, Land. & T. 10; Doc v. Buteman, 2 Barn. & Ald. 168.

This case differs from any heretofore before the courts of this State, in that the lessee has granted for a term longer than his own; and in such a case existence of reversion in him is an impossibility.

Ecker v. Chicago, etc. R. R. Co. 8 Mo. App. 223; Boyce v. Bakerell, 37 Mo. 492.

In England it is settled that a reversion is essential to a lease; and when a grantor has transferred all his term and estate in the demised premises, the instrument of transfer will operate as an assignment of the lease and not as an under lease, notwithstanding the reservation of a rent to the grantor or a writ of re-entry on nonpayment or on the nonperformance by the grantee of covenants contained in it and although words of demise be used instead of words of assignment.

Whatever may be the terms used in the instrument, provided they are sufficient to convey the entire estate or term of the grantor, the instrument operates to create the transferee the assignee of the original lessor, without regard to the intention of the parties that the instrument should create the relation of landlord and tenant between the assignor and the assignee.

Porter's Lessee v. French, 9 Irish Law Rep. 514; Smiley v. Van Winkle, 6 Cal. 605.

The agreement for the purchase of the demised premises contained in the Stewart lease does not alter the legal effect of the instrument as an assignment between the original lessor and the Long Island Railroad Company.

Langford v. Selmes, 3 Kay & J. 220.

III. The general rule is subject to the modification that the same instrument may be an assignment between the original lessor and the transferee, and a sublease between the parties to it.

IV. The covenant to surrender at the end of the term cannot itself create a reversion. The right of re-entry at the expiration of the term attends the reversion. If there is no reversion there is no right of re-entry. The covenant adds nothing to the legal duty imposed on every tenant; it is an incident of the reversion which exists wholly apart from it.

Blumenberg v. Myres, 32 Cal. 95; Schilling v. Holmes, 23 Cal. 230.

Mr. E. B. Hinsdale, for respondent:

I. The lease to this defendant did not transfer all the interest to the lessor in the Stewart contract; therefore it could not operate as an assignment of that contract. It is essential to the assignment of a lease by operation of law that the whole interest of the original lessee should be transferred. If there be any residuum of interest, then the second lessee becomes an under tenant of the first lessee; and no privity of estate exists between the under tenant and the original landlord.

There was a very valuable interest remaining in the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, outside of its lease to this defendant; for, under the agreement of purchase from Stewart, the Central Railroad Company and its successor by consolidation, the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, were equitable owners. Their interest was real estate which, in case of an individual, would descend to heirs.

II. Even if the whole term under the Stewart contract had been vested in this defendant under the lease to it, the latter would still create an under tenancy and not an assignment; for when there are essential differences between the two contracts and where there is any substantial or valuable right or interest reserved by the first lessee against his tenant, the latter will be regarded as an under tenant and not an assignee.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether the defendant, by entering into the contract of May, 1876, with the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, came into such a relation with the original lessor of the railroad in question, represented by the plaintiff, as to subject it to liability directly to her for the rent reserved by the original lease of January, 1873, from her deviser, Alexander T. Stewart, to the Central Railroad Company of Long Island.

The facts are so fully stated in the opinion of my learned brother, Finch, J., that it is not necessary to repeat them in detail.

That the contract of A. T. Stewart with the Central Railroad Company of Long Island, dated January, 1878, was a lease of the road for the term of fifty years cannot, I think, be disputed; and thus far in the discussions in this court it has been conceded.

The annual rent reserved was a percentage upon the agreed cost of the road, liable to be augmented by a percentage upon such further expenditures as might be made by the landlord during the term. If this had been all of the contract there would have been no difference of opinion between us; but it contained further provisions which have given rise to the present discussion.

The ordinary covenant to surrender the demised premises on the last day of the term was made subject to the further provisions of the contract, which were: that the lessee covenanted at the expiration of the said term of fifty years from January 7, 1878, to pay to the lessor the principal sum by him expended on the road, and that upon such payment, but not before, the payment of rent should thereafter cease, such rent however to be paid up to such time; and that upon such payment of such principal sum, the lessee, its successors or assigns should not surrender the said demised premises but should be vested with the fee simple of the right of way and all the property appurtenant thereto owned by the lessor; and that the contract should thereupon and upon such payment be deemed a sufficient grant or deed of conveyance; and that the lessor should then execute such further deed as might be necessary, etc.

Until the payment of the principal sum, however, the rent was to continue, and the lease contained the usual provisions for re-entry, for nonpayment of rent or the breach of the other covenants in the instrument, which were numerous.

In June, 1874, the entire interest of the Central Company, under this lease and contract, became vested in the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, to which the contract was assigned, and in May, 1876, the latter company entered into the agreement with the defendant which is set forth in the opinion of Finch, J., and the effect of which is now in question.

The main feature of that agreement, to which it is necessary for the purposes of this discussion to refer, is that the last named company leased to the defendant the whole of the property which was demised by Stewart to the Central Railroad Company, and for a term longer than that of the original lease, viz.: for the term of ninety-nine years. It thus transferred to the defendant the entire term during which the Central Railroad Company was to hold the demised premises as lessee of Alexander T. Stewart, and left no particle of that term in the original lessee or in its first assignee, the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company; and the question now before us is whether it operated, as between the original lessor Stewart, or his devisee, and the defendant, as an assignment of that entire term, and thus established a privity of estate between them which rendered the defendant liable to the original lessor; or whether it was, as between those parties, a mere sublease under which the defendant was liable only to its immediate lessor.

The rules relating to the effect of an assignment of a lease are so well settled that it is hardly necessary to do more than refer to them.

Where a lessee assigns his whole estate without reserving any reversion therein in himself, a privity of estate is at once created between his assignee and the original lessor; and the latter has a right of action directly against the assignee on the covenant to pay rent, or any other covenant in the lease which runs with the land; but if the lessee sublets the premises, reserving or retaining any such reversion, however small, the privity of the estate is not established and the original landlord has no right of action against the sublessee, there being neither privity of contract nor of estate between them.

Where a lessee of land leases the same land to a third party, the question has often arisen whether the second lease is, in legal effect, an assignment of the original lease or a mere sublease. The question has frequently, and probably most generally, arisen between the lessee and his transferee; and much confusion will be avoided by observing the distinction between those cases and cases where the question has been between the transferee and the original landlord. In the latter class of cases the rule is well settled that if the lessee parts with his whole term or interest as lessee, or makes a lease for a period exceeding his whole term, it will as to the landlord amount to an assignment of the lease; and the essence of the instrument as an assignment, so far as the original lessor is concerned, will not be destroyed by its reserving a new rent to the assignor with a power of re-entry for nonpayment, nor by its assuming, by the use of the word demise or otherwise, the character of a sublease; and the assignee, so long as he continues to hold the estate, is liable directly to the original lessor on all covenants in the original lease which run with the land, including the covenant to pay rent. Taylor, Land. & T. 7th ed. 109; Hicks v. Downing, 1 Ld. Raym. 99; Palmer v. Edwards, 1 Doug. 187 [note]; Smith v. Mapleback, 1 Term R. 441; Porter's Lessee v. French, 9 Irish Law Rep. 514; Parmenter v. Webber, 8 Taunt. 593; Doe v. Bateman, 2 Barn. & Ald. 168; Wollaston v. Hake-will, 3 Scott, N. R. 616; Pluck v. Digges, 5 Bligh, N. R. 31; Beaumont v. Salisbury, 19 Beav. 196; Thorn v. Woodcombe, 8 Barn. & Adol. 586.

But as between the original lessee and his lessee or transferee, even though the original lessee demises his whole term, if the parties intend a lease, the relation of landlord and tenant, as to all but strict reversionary rights, will arise between them.

The effect, therefore, of a demise by a lessee for a period equal to or exceeding his whole term, is to divest him of any reversionary right and render his lessee liable, as assignee, to the original lessor; but at the same time the relation of landlord and tenant is created between the parties to the second demise if they so intended. Taylor, Land. & T. 7th ed. § 109, notes 16, a 5; 1 Wash. Real Prop. 4th ed. 515, n. 6; Adams v. Beach, 1 Phila. 99; Indianapolis Mfg. & Carpenters Union v. Cleveland, etc. R. R. Co. 45 Ind. 281; Lee v. Payn, 4 Mich. 106; Lloyd v. Cozens, 2 Ashm. 138; Wood, Land, & T. Barks' ed. § 347.

These rules are fully recognized in this State. Prescott v. DeForest, 16 Johns. 159; Bedford v. Terkune, 80 N. Y. 453, 457; Davis v. Morris, 86 N. Y. 569; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 891, 892.

There can be no doubt that in the present case the original lessee of Stewart parted with its whole term of fifty years and that the defendant acquired it. The Central Railroad Company assigned the entire contract, embracing the term of fifty years as well as the right of purchase of the fee at the end of the fifty years, to the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company; and I do not understand it to be denied by anyone that that company became liable to Stewart directly on the covenants in the lease, as assignee of the entire interest of the lessee.

But the Flushing, North Shore and Central Railroad Company, by its contract with the defendant, did not assign to the latter the right of purchase at the end of the term of fifty years. It, however, leased the road to the defendant for the term of ninety-nine years, and the defendant covenanted to surrender the demised premises to its immediate lessor at the end of the ninety-nine years. That term, however, being greater than the term of fifty years granted in the original lease, the instrument operated as an assignment of that term, and left no reversion therein in the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company; consequently during the continuance of the term of fifty years there was a perfect privity of estate between the defendant and the original lessor, and the legal estate in reversion was in the original lessor during the fifty years; and he or those succeeding to his estate were, both legally and equitably, entitled to the rents and had a right of action therefor directly against the defendant by reason of this privity of estate.

It is contended that the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, as the assignee of the Central Railroad Company, had more than the term of fifty years, granted in the original lease, because it was also assignee of the contract of Stewart by which, in case at the end of the term the Central Railroad Company should have performed the covenants in the lease and should then pay to Stewart the principal sum expended by him in the construction of the road, the contract should operate as a conveyance in fee of the demised premises; that under this contract the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company was the equitable owner of the fee as well as of the term, and was in possession under both titles when it leased to the defendant; that the lease to the defendant, being for only ninety-nine years, did not transfer its entire interest in the premises but left in it a reversion at the expiration of that term, at which time the defendant covenanted to surrender to it, and consequently its lease to the defendant was not an assignment but a sublease.

That argument would be very forcible if the question arose between the defendant and the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, and was whether the relation of landlord and tenant subsisted between them. But it has no application to the question upon which this case turns. The equitable estate in reversion, claimed to be in the Flushing, North Shore & Central Railroad Company, as purchaser, is not a reversion in the term of fifty years.

The whole of that term has been transferred to the defendant; not a particle of it is retained by its immediate lessor; and there is absolutely nothing intervening between the estate of the defendant, as assignee of the lessee, for the fifty years and the legal estate in reversion of the original lessor or his devisee; and the right to the rents follows that legal estate in reversion.

The owners of the equitable estate claimed have no right, legal or equitable, to the rents. During the term of fifty years the original lessor or his devisee is entitled to them, and the whole term of fifty years being vested in the defendant it is directly liable to the holder of the legal estate in reversion, there being a privity of estate between them. If a present equitable right to the rents were vested in the same parties in whom the equitable estate in reversion is alleged to be vested, different questions might arise.

The fact that the lease to the defendant reserves a different rent from that reserved in the original lease, with a clause for re-entry, cannot affect the question, as between the parties to the present controversy, of its operating in law as an assignment of the term.

These points were expressly adjudicated in the cases of Doe v. Bateman, 2 Barn. & Ald. 168; and Wollaston v. Hakevill, 3 Scott, N. R. 616.

Neither can the covenant to surrender have any bearing. It was a covenant to surrender at the expiration of the ninety-nine years' lease, long after the expiration of the fifty years' lease.

Where, in an assignment of a lease or in a demise by the lessee for the same term as that granted by the original lease, there is a covenant to surrender to the assignor, this has in some cases been held to prevent the sublease from operating as an assignment; but this has been because the whole instrument, taken together, has been held to reserve to the original lessee some fragment of the original term, although almost inappreciable in point of duration, as in the case of Post v. Kearney, 2 N. Y. 394, where the assignee of a lease demised the premises for the residue of his term, reserving the right to a delivery of possession by his assignee to him on the last day of the term, and a right to intermediate possession in case the building should be destroyed by fire.

These reservations were held sufficient to characterize the demise as a sublease and not an assignment. The right to possession on the last day would leave a fragment of that day of the term in the assignor and was sufficient to create a technical reversion and thus prevent a privity of estate between his lessee and the original lessor.

In Collins v. Hasbrouck, 56 N. Y. 157, the sublease was of part of the demised premises and was for only two years and seven months, out of a term of ten years, and expired four years before the original lease; but the sublessee had the privilege of four years more, provided he gave two months' notice. The action was ejectment, brought by the original lessor against an assignee of the second lessee, claiming that the original lease had been forfeited by the breach of a covenant on the part of the lessee which it contained, that he would not sublet or relet the demised premises or any part thereof without written consent, etc., under penalty of forfeiture of the term; and the sublease before referred to was claimed to be a breach of that covenant. The judgment below was for the landlord but it was reversed in this court, upon the ground that the alleged forfeiture had been waived by the landlord. In the opinion the question is discussed whether the sublease amounted to an assignment of the term of the original lease or a mere subletting or reletting of part of the demised premises. This question, in view of the result reached on the question of waiver, ceased to be controlling; but in discussing it the learned judge delivering the opinion made some remarks touching the effect of reserving a new rent in the sublease, and of reserving to the original lessee a right of re-entry for breach of condition by his lessee, which have given rise to some confusion.

The features of the instruments which are above referred to would be proper subjects of consideration, for the purpose of determining whether the relation of landlord and tenant was created as between the original lessee and his lessee, and bore upon the question then before the court, viz.: whether the second lease was a subletting or reletting of part of the demised premises, which constituted a breach of the covenant not to sublet or relet.

But the question of privity of estate between the original lessor and the lessee of his lessee was not in the case. The determination of that question depends upon whether the whole of the term of the original lessee became vested in his lessee, and the circumstances that the second lease reserves a different rent or a right of reentry for breach of condition are immaterial. Doe v. Bateman, 2 Barn. & Ald. 168; Wollaston v. Hakewill, 3 Scott, N. R. 616; Prescott v. De Forest, 16 Johns. 159; 5 Bacon, Abr. Leases, I, 3; Palmer v. Edwards, 1 Doug. 187, [note]; Smith v. Mapleback, 1 Term R. 444; Smiley v. Van Winkle, 6 Cal. 605; Lloyd v. Cozens, 2 Ashm. 188; 2 Preston, Con. 124; Taylor, Land. & T. 7th ed. § 109; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 515, n. 6.

The cases which hold that where a lessee subleases the demised premises for the whole of his term, but his lessee covenants to surrender to him at the end of the term, the sublease does not operate as an assignment, proceed upon the theory that by reason of this covenant to surrender some fragment of the term remains in the original lessor.

In most of the cases, and in the earlier cases in which this doctrine was broached, the language of the covenant was that the sublessee would surrender the demised premises on the last day of the term.

In Iggot v. Mason, 1 Paige, 412, by the original lease the lessee had thirty days after the expiration of the lease to remove buildings from the demised premises. His assignee subleased for the residue of the term and his lessee covenanted to surrender possession "on the last day of the term."

In Post v. Kearney, 2 N. Y. 894, the covenant of the sublessee was that on the last day of his term he would surrender the possession of the demised premises to his lessor. P. 395.

Some fragment of that last day was therefore reserved to the original lessee, for he was entitled to the surrender during some portion of the last day. This was held sufficient to establish a technical reversion in the original lessee, and thus prevented a privity of estate from arising between his lessee and the original landlord. The same theory has been subsequently adopted in cases where the language of the covenant has been that the second lessee would surrender to his lessor at the expiration of the term of the sublease without adverting to any distinction.

In Ganson v. Tift, 71 N. Y. 48, 54, the sublease provided that at the expiration of the term, or other sooner determination of the demise, the lessee should surrender the demised premises to the lessor, and the court says: "This constituted a sublease of the premises and not an assignment of the entire term."

It is obvious that the covenant to surrender cannot, in the present case, have the effect which was given to it in the cases cited, for it was to surrender at the expiration of a term of ninety-nine years, the original lease being for only fifty years, and there is no theory upon which it can be pretended that any vestige of that term or of any reversion therein remains in the lessor of the defendant.

The agreement to transfer the fee to the lessee did not merge the term of fifty years nor prevent the relation of landlord and tenant subsisting between the original lessee or its transferee of the term during its continuance. The lessee was to become entitled to the fee only in case it performed the covenants and paid the principal of the cost of the road; and the lease provides in terms that on such payment being made, but not before, the rent reserved in the lease shall cease. The payment of this principal sum at the end of the fifty years, as well as of the other sums reserved, was by the very terms of the contract made a condition precedent to the vesting of the fee in the lessee.

In this respect the case does not differ in substance from Bostwick v. Frankfield, 74 N. Y. 207, where a similar covenant to convey a fee to the lessee was held not to create an equitable estate in fee in the lessee in which his estate as lessee merged, but that the lease remained in full force and the relation of landlord and tenant continued until performance of the contract of purchase; and the landlord was entitled to dispossess the lessee by summary proceedings against him as tenant. In that case it was held that the doctrine which treats an individual who has contracted for the purchase of land as the owner, could not be applied when the intention of the parties was clearly adverse to such a presumption, and that a provision in the contract, that unless carried out at the time named it should become void, negated such an intention.

Here the provision is that the lessee shall hold as tenant for the term of fifty years, paying rent; and that at the end of the fifty years the lessee shall pay to the lessor the principal sum by him expended upon the road, and that upon such payment "but not before," the rent should cease, such rent however to be paid up to such time, and upon such payment of the said principal sum the lessee to be vested with the title; the right to re-enter for nonpayment of rent or breach of covenant being fully reserved.

These provisions plainly manifest an intention that no title, except an estate for years, shall vest in the lessee until the end of the term and the payment of the principal and all rent in arrears; and that in the meantime the fee and the reversion should remain in the lessor.

Until the expiration of the term the only estate which vested in the lessee was an estate for years, which was entirely separable from the right to acquire the fee. The lessee could assign the term and retain the contract for the purchase of the fee; and by such an assignment the assignee would be brought into privity with the original landlord who would be entitled to his action directly against the assignee of the term so long as it continued such assignee. It could divest itself of this liability at any time before rent had accrued, by assigning over the term; but so long as it continued to hold the term it held as tenant of the original landlord and was subject to be proceeded against as such.

The original lessee, or the lessor of the defendant, as has been shown, retained no portion of the term and consequently no reversion. Whatever equitable rights it may have had were to arise in futuro. An estate to arise in futuro cannot be tacked on to the estate of a lessee who has assigned his whole term, so as to create a reversion in him and establish the relation of landlord and tenant between him and the person to whom he has assigned his term, so far as strictly reversionary rights are concerned, or prevent that relation from existing between such person and the original landlord.

In Prescott v. DeForest, 16 Johns. 159, Stewart leased a house to Satterlee for one year from the first of May, 1817. Satterlee then leased part of the house to the plaintiff at $1,000 per annum, payable quarterly, for the same term for which he had taken it. On the first of February, 1818, Satterlee obtained a new lease of the house from the landlord, for one year from the first of May, 1818. On the second of March, 1818, Stewart distrained the goods of the plaintiff on the premises, for rent in arrears, and sold them in due form and the defendant became the purchaser. The right to distrain for rent was incident to and inseparable from the reversion, and it was held that Satterlee had no reversion; that the lease from him to the plaintiff, being for the whole of his own term, must be deemed an assignment and not an underletting, although it was for only part of the premises and reserved a new rent, payable to himself; that there was no privity of estate between him and the plaintiff, but privity of contract merely; that although at the time of the distress, Satterlee had a second lease from May 1, 1818, to May 1, 1819, that extension of his term did not operate to vest a reversion in him, because it was to commence in futuro; and in the meantime the reversion continued in Stewart, the original landlord, who by reason of privity of estate had the right to sue the plaintiff or distrain her goods for the rent due him. On this ground the distress by Satterlee was held void.

So in the present case, the title of the defendant's lessor under the Stewart contract, to the fee of the demised premises was not to commence until the end of the term of fifty years, and the payment of the purchase money; and whatever equitable rights the defendant's lessor may have had under that contract, it is clear that in the meantime the legal estate in reversion continued in Stewart and his devisee; and the right to the rent followed the reversion.

The contract was not a present sale of the fee, under which the equitable title vested in the purchaser and the title to the purchase money in the vendor; but was for a sale to take place in futuro, that is, at the end of the fifty years.

It was expressly stipulated in the Stewart contract that the rent payable to Stewart should cease at the end of the fifty years and not before; and that then on the payment of the stipulated sum, the lessee should become vested with the fee. This was, in substance, a contract that Stewart's lessee should hold as his tenant under the lease until the expiration of the term, and that the other rights secured by the contract should then commence to operate. Whether they will then ripen into a title depends upon whether the lessor of the defendant performs the conditions precedent upon which the vesting of the title is conditioned.

In Langford v. Selmes, 3 Kay & J. 220, a lessee for a term of ninety-nine years, with the option of purchasing the fee simple in reversion, granted a lease for a term which exceeded the residue of his own term; and it was held that this lease established a privity of estate between the last lessee and the original lessor.

The case is not precisely in point, because here there was an unconditional contract to pay the cost of the road at the end of the term, and that on such payment the title should vest; but nevertheless the vesting of the title was conditioned on the lapse of the fifty years and on the payment being made at the end of the term. This contract, however, did not operate to enlarge the term of the original lease; it was separable from the estate for years held by the original lessee, and the transfer of the whole of that term to the defendant, while the legal estate in reversion together with the legal and equitable right to the rents were in the plaintiff, established a privity of estate between the defendant and the plaintiff which entitled her to maintain this action directly against the defendant on the covenant to pay rent contained in the original lease from Stewart.

The judgments of the General and Special Terms should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

Finch, J., dissenting:

The characteristic difference between an assignment of his lease and underletting by the original tenant resides in the inquiry whether as a result of the transaction the primary lessee has transferred his whole and entire estate and completely parted with his title, or has retained in himself some fragment or shred of his estate, either substantial or even formal and technical.

An underletting implies a constituted relation of landlord and tenant between the parties contracting; and, that in turn, the existence in the landlord of an estate superior to the leasehold and out of which the latter is carved; for there can be no tenure held of one whose title is utterly destroyed. This rule prevails even over the apparent intention, not because that intention ceases to be the test and standard of interpretation; but because an impossible intention is never presumed in preference to one possible and operative between the parties.

The rule in its origin, under the feudal system, had a substantial and beneficial force. To the superior lord a service of fealty was due from the tenant, in virtue of his tenure; and if the lessee could part with the whole of his estate to one holding only under him the service of fealty was gone; and so in that case the new tenant was deemed to hold under the paramount title as an assignee of the lease, put in the place and room of the original tenant, and bound by his covenants to render his service. Of course that useful result has gone out of the doctrine, and it remains with us simply a rule of legal logic, much less deserving the power to override and pervert the discovered intention of the parties. As a consequence, a plain tendency to enforce that intention, even upon very narrow and technical grounds, has been developed.

Originally a reversion in the primary lessee, of some fragment of his estate, was needful to support a sublease. It was said that it might be for a day, an hour, or even a minute, but must nevertheless be, and leave in the primary lessee a reversion having a tangible existence. But that reversion now may be purely technical, and the product of reasoning rather than of substantial fact. It has been held that where the original tenant transferred for the identical term of his own lease, but the transferee covenanted to surrender to him, a reversion was implied from that fact, although no man can measure it as a tangible thing, since both surrenders, that of the subtenant to the primary lessee and that of the latter to the original landlord, are due under the contracts at the same precise moment of time. Collins v. Hasbrouck, 56 N. Y. 157; Ganson v. Tift, 71 N. Y. 48.

Indeed, the cases cited seem to go further than that and to hold that the reservation of a right of re-entry for breach of condition, and even the reservation of a new rent, makes the instrument a sublease. The case cited as to the effect of a re-entry (Doe v. Bateman, 2 Barn. & Ald. 168) so far from holding that a reserved right of re-entry necessarily implies a reversion, appears to me to hold the exact contrary and to determine that such right may and often does exist by pure force of the contract and without the shadow of a reversion in the land.

It is not necessary, however, to say whether the cases in our own State are in every respect correctly reasoned. It is quite obvious that they mean this at least: that the contract of the parties, construed according to their plain intention as expressed by it, shall prevail where upon such construction that contract is a possible one and can be rendered effective in subordination to established legal rules; and that where a sublease is manifestly intended, the court will search diligently and even closely for some trace of a reversion to support it.

And this result of the cases in our own court is fully sustained in the case of Porter's Lessee v. French, 9 Irish Law Rep. 514, in which the English cases were carefully reviewed, and it was held among other things: "It has been argued and found that the court in construing this instrument should have special regard to its form; I mean to the circumstance that it is in the ordinary form of a lease, and that we are bound to give effect to the manifest intention of the parties themselves (a principle which I fully admit) subject, however, to the consideration that there are certain known rules and principles of law which it is not competent to individuals to set aside or overturn at their pleasure."

So that we may proceed on the assured basis that what was intended as a lease must be construed as a lease unless some inexorable legal necessity prevents.

We are now to consider the application of this doctrine to the facts developed in the case at bar. The contract of Stewart with the Central Railroad Company of Long Island was made in January of 1873. That contract begins with a recital that Stewart has built a first class railroad from his Hempstead Plains purchase to Farmingdale, at a cost which has been adjusted between the parties at the sum of $393,000, upon lands partly owned by him and partly obtained by the Central Company under the statute, but which last were paid for by Stewart; and that it is intended, by the party of the first part, to lease the constructed line to the party of the second part.

The contract then "in consideration of the rents, covenants and agreements" thereafter mentioned, proceeds to "grant, demise and to farm let" the property, describing it, together with "the railroad track, side tracks, depots, water tanks, gravel banks and all buildings thereon and appurtenances thereunto belonging" for the term of fifty years, the railroad company paying therefor annually, for the first three years, "the yearly sum or rent" of 7 per cent upon the agreed cost, and for the remaining forty-seven years 10 per cent upon such cost.

The contract further provides that if Stewart should expend further sums in the completion or equipment of the line, or for a double track, this expense should be added to the principal sum upon which the rental percentage was to be computed; that the lessee should pay all taxes, assessments and charges upon the property; that such company should run daily trains for passengers and freight, and that for a violation of this covenant or of that to pay rent, Stewart should be at liberty to re-enter; and that on the last day of the term, the lessee would surrender the property to the lessor, subject, however, "as hereinafter provided."

That limitation upon the duty of surrender appears in a following agreement of purchase and sale, by which the Railroad Company covenants, at the end of the fifty years to pay to Stewart the principal sum by him expended, upon which the rental percentage has been computed, upon which payment the lessee shall not surrender, but shall be vested with the fee and the contract be deemed a sufficient deed of conveyance.

An additional contract between the parties specified what work was to be done upon tracks connecting with Garden City under an agreement with Pappenhusen, of which the Railroad Company had become owner; and added that expenditure to the principal drawing the rental percentage and provided for an accounting to adjust the amount of such principal.

In June, 1874, the Central Company consolidated with the Flushing, North Shore and Central Railroad Company and to it the Stewart contract was assigned. In May, 1876, that Company made a contract with the defendant, the legal effect of which is here in question. By that instrument the Flushing Company leased to the Long Island Company the whole of its railroad from Long Island City to Babylon, including all its rolling stock, tools and machinery and all its branch lines, among which were those constructed by Stewart, for a term of ninety-nine years and a gross rent beginning with over $200,000, and increasing year by year for six years until a final rental of $351,000 became permanently fixed.

This rental agreement provided, for the protection of the lessee, that it might withhold the stipulated payments of rent to the amount of the Flushing Company's interest upon its bonded debt and of its incumbering rents, and apply its payments upon them as so much cash paid to the lessor; but such interest and rents were not to exceed the yearly maximum agreed upon.

Further provisions determined the order of application of the lessee's gross earnings; for subrogation to the rights of the bondholders if it should pay the lessor's bonds; for re-entry upon breach of covenants; and a surrender to the lessor at the end of the term. The question now comes, whether this instrument relatively to the Stewart lines was a lease or an assignment of the Stewart contract so far as that was itself a lease.

Of that contract two views may be taken. It may be treated as one complete agreement, establishing relations in accordance with all its terms as they act and react upon each other, or as two separate and independent agreements, having no necessary connection save that they happen to be written on one and the same paper.

The last is the appellant's contention. Her counsel divide the contract into its component parts, and argue that it consists: first, of a lease for fifty years, and then of a contract for the sale and purchase of the railroad; and that the two agreements are so free from any dependence upon each other that they might just as well have been contained in separate instruments.

Let us suppose that they had been. The supposition at once disturbs the theory of relative independence, since we discover that to make two instruments we are required to change the covenant to surrender in the lease, "subject, however, as hereinafter provided," to one "subject to the provisions of an agreement of purchase and sale made concurrently herewith;" and are further compelled to add to the terms of the sale contract, which is conditioned for a conveyance upon the prior payment of the rent reserved, a clause referring to the lease as a means of identifying the amount and times of payment of the rent intended.

The integrity of the surrender covenant in the lease contract can only be preserved by a reference to the sale contract; and the integrity of the sale agreement can only be saved by a reference to the lease to determine the rent payable as a condition; and we should be required to read the two instruments thus mutually referring to each other, made at the same time and relating to the same property, together and as if they were one, the inquiry being, What agreed relations subsisted? So that the question would recur whether the two instruments established two separate and distinct relations, or one single relation as the joint product of the two agreements.

We may solve that problem by aid of the inquiry whether at one and the same time the two separate relations could coexist without affecting or modifying each other. Under what is called the lease, the Central Railroad Company was a tenant for years, having merely a leasehold estate, the main and vital characteristic of which was a surrender of possession to Stewart at the close of the term. Under the contract of purchase, the railroad company was the equitable owner in fee, and not bound to surrender possession at all, and in terms relieved from that duty.

This assertion involves the character of the possession taken by the original vendee and lessee, which, in one view of the case, is the pivotal and determining inquiry. The complaint alleges that the Central Company went in under what is denominated the "indenture of lease and supplementary agreement." The meaning of that phrase so used in the pleading is shown by a later averment, where it is said that the Flushing Company assigned "said indenture of lease and supplementary agreement to this defendant, a copy of which instrument is hereto annexed, marked A." And the assignment of the whole contract which was made by the Central Company to the Flushing Company upon the consolidation, is described as "the said indenture of lease and supplementary agreement." So that the allegation is not that the Central Company went in under the lease as a part or fragment of the contract, or under one of its branches, but under the contract as a whole.

The answer discloses that understanding of the complaint and admits the allegation thus: "that under and pursuant to said instruments," the Central Company went into possession.

The parties thus agreeing upon the fact of possession under the contract, no proof was given or offered to the contrary, or to establish an intention to give or take possession under one branch of it alone.

We are bound, therefore, to assume that the Central Company was in possession under the contract as a whole, and both as lessee and vendee; a result not only compelled by the pleadings but indicated by a marked characteristic of the contract, that under both of its branches there was to be one continuous and unchanging possession.

It was not stipulated that the Central Company should hold possession as tenant for fifty years and then surrender that possession to the landlord and take a new one as vendee, but that at the end of the term it should not surrender at all the possession already taken.

That the Central Company was in both as lessee and vendee is further unmistakably indicated by a provision of the supplementary agreement which modifies the annual payments to be made. The language used: "The lease bearing even date herewith is modified, and its conditions temporarily made to conform to this instrument, so that no rent or interest shall begin to accrue to the party of the first part until July 1, 1873, and the first quarter's rent or interest shall be and become payable three months thereafter."

The dual character of the payments to be made is thus clearly recognized; they are rent and they are also interest; and are one or the other interchangeably, by reason of the dual character of the possession; for if the Central Company was in only as tenant, it was nonsense to speak of its rents as synonymous with interest.

And beyond the admission of the pleadings and the obvious intent of the parties indicated by their written stipulations, it is further true that a possession taken generally and not in terms specially limited to some character or right is measured by and under the protection of the entire right belonging to the possessor, and cannot be driven out from its shelter and placed under a mere fragment or component part of such right.

The rule goes so far as this: where one takes a lease for a number of years and during the term enters into a contract of purchase with his landlord, of the same property, his possession which was taken as tenant operates as notice to one dealing with the landlord in respect to the land; not merely of his right as tenant but of his right to the inheritance. The possession although taken as tenant becomes also a possession as purchaser, protecting him as such to the extent of his entire right. Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 253.

So that it becomes manifest that if we suppose the one contract to have been divided into two separate papers, not only would they require to be read together as mutually dependent upon each other, neither alone fixing the rights of the contractors, but possession under each, under one as lessee, and under the other as vendee, would stand admitted. That ends all practical results from a supposed separation of the two branches of the one contract, and we may drop the supposition and reason upon the contract as it stands.

The possession of the Central Company as purchaser under the contract gave it at once, upon the execution of that instrument, an equitable estate in fee. Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 398; Hays' Admr. v. Miller, 6 Hun, 320; affd. 70 N. Y. 112; Pelton v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co. 77 N. Y. 605.

Had the company been an individual its interest under the contract, springing at once upon its execution, would have been real estate, descendible to his heirs and devisable as such. Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92.

In equity the vendor simply holds the legal title as trustee for the vendee. The Central Company, therefore, under the contract had two estates; one legal and the other equitable; a legal estate as tenant for years and an equitable estate as owner of the fee; the former a chattel real, the latter equivalent to a freehold; and these were concurrent and not consecutive, if we assume that no merger was possible or intended. There is no difficulty in thus treating them. In case of nonpayment of the rent, the Central Company would forfeit its right of possession both as lessee and vendee, since that payment is the condition of both estates; it is equally rent and interest, and so described. And as to remedies, Stewart might bring ejectment or proceed summarily under the Landlord and Tenant Act, since the Central Company could not deny its tenancy and its landlord's title, or defendant's possession as owner, under a contract broken and forfeited. If any doubt surrounded the summary remedy as sufficiently effective, ejectment would give redress.

But if there is difficulty in so treating them, if, as concurrent separate estates, they seem inharmonious and inconsistent, it will merely result that the equitable estate of inheritance will draw after it the term. Capel v. Girdler, 9 Ves. 509.

In the case cited the Master of the Rolls said: "I thought it had long been established that where the same person has the inheritance and the term in himself, though he has in one the equitable interest, and the legal estate in the other, the inheritance draws to itself the term and makes that dependent upon it;" and after citing several cases he added: "I did not apprehend that it was open to dispute."

The purchaser, therefore, under this contract could have conveyed the fee and put its grantee in possession as owner. It could, as it did, carve out of its fee an estate for ninety-nine years, stretching beyond the term of its lease, and ending with a surrender day and a reversion in fee in itself. Was that lease in any respect void beyond the fifty years? And after having cut the Stewart contract into two instruments, must we also sever the defendant's lease into halves and give him one landlord for the fifty years and another for the forty-nine succeeding? Is it possible that the immediate lessor, making one complete lease for one entire term, had no remedies of a landlord against a tenant for the first half of the term, but got them new born at the beginning of the last half? For that is the inevitable result of the appellant's theory.

During the fifty years the Flushing Company, on the basis asserted, could not dispossess the defendant under the Landlord and Tenant Act, for that remedy depends upon the existence of the conventional relation of landlord and tenant between the parties; and where there is not an underletting there is no such relation; and it is precisely for the reason that no such relation does or can exist that the construction of an assignment prevails. How could the Flushing Company make affidavit that such relation existed? Stewart alone could do that, for he becomes the sole landlord.

This difficulty is not answered by the cases which hold that even where there is an assignment the assignor may collect an excess of rent beyond what is due under the original lease, for such actions rest upon the express promise to pay, and not on an extinguished tenancy; and what is recovered is really not rent but purchase price of the lease sold and assigned.

In what character or capacity did the immediate lessor of the defendant make the lease for ninety-nine years? Certainly not in the character or capacity of a lessee of Mrs. Stewart, for as such it had no power to do as it did do; and as such the lease to defendant would neither have been given nor accepted. It is true that a lessee for ten years cannot by a lease for eleven years clothe himself with a reversion and so make his contract a sublease, but that is because he has no reversion beyond the ten years and cannot gain one by his own wrong; but here there is no wrong, since there is an existing reversion in fee upon which the sublease is founded. It can stand upon it. Why should it not? It was so meant and intended.

Why should we do violence to the intention when no legal necessity compels? The lessee under the Stewart contract and by virtue of its terms was something more than a mere lessee for years during even the first fifty years, for its equitable estate began at the same moment with its legal estate and existed through the whole term of the latter. It did not assign its whole estate to the defendant, which it derived from Stewart, and that is conceded. Nobody claims that the equitable fee passed to the defendant. But a transfer is an assignment only when the person transferring parts with the whole estate derived from the original lessor. If that estate be a fee, he must transfer a fee. Van Rensselaer's Exrs. v. Gallup, 5 Denio, 454.

The case is not at all like that of Langford v. Selnes, 3 Kay & J. 220, to which we are referred as authority for the proposition that the covenant of sale added to the lease does not prevent a transfer of the leased estate from being an assignment. In the contract in that case there was merely an option to purchase which could only be exercised at the end of the term. There the lessee had, under the contract, no estate beyond his term. He had a legal estate but no equitable one. Whether he would have the latter or not remained uncertain until he exercised his option at the specified time. Meanwhile and during the leasehold estate, he had only the leasehold estate and no other in the land; and when the learned English vice-chancellor said: "There is no authority for the proposition," he referred to the argument, which he states, "that on the subsequent acquisition of the fee simple by the original lessee an estoppel arose by which, on the expiration of the original lease, the supposed under lessee will hold of the under lessor who had affected to demise to him at a rent of six pounds for a term greater than he was possessed of at the date of the under lease."

Here, on the contrary, the under lessor did not demise for a term "greater than he was possessed of," for it had the fee and carved out of it a lesser estate.

The case of Bostwick v. Frankfield, 74 N. Y. 207, presented a similar feature, although in a different form. Two distinct estates, one a leasehold and the other an equitable fee, were claimed to have been created at different times; but the latter was in substance, although not in form, a mere option, since the effect of nonperformance by the vendee was stipulated to make the contract of purchase null and void.

It must be remembered that the present is not so much a question of merger, resulting from the meeting in one ownership of two distinct estates, but whether two estates were created at all; and if they were, whether the two taken together and constituting the complete right of the lessee and vendee did not leave in it such a reversion as made possible the relation of landlord and tenant between it and its alleged and intended lessee.

It is not clear that two estates were created. Substantially it is possible to say there was but one, and that growing out of the contract of purchase and sale. What is called rent may be deemed, for the first three years, but legal interest upon the agreed cost to Stewart; and for forty-seven years that interest, with 8 per cent additional, to be added to the cost in making up the full purchase price. While the agreed percentage is called rent, it is substantially interest and in part purchase money, and is called "rent or interest."

If, however, in view of its language, notwithstanding that but one possession was to be taken under it, and that to be continuous and forever, we must still say that there were two estates, separate but succeeding each other without break or altered possession, we are obliged to change the beginning of the equitable estate from the date of the contract to the end of the fifty years; a construction which violates the legal effect of the instrument and postpones the equitable estate unduly.

If, however, we do that and, compelled by seeming difficulties, say that the original lessee had a legal estate for years and at its close an equitable estate in fee, then for the first time up springing, so that the two estates were in no manner concurrent but strictly successive, I doubt whether even then the rule which makes an intended lease an assignment of a prior one would have any just application.

If one has a lease for five years and then afterwards takes an additional lease for five years more to commence at the end of the first one, may he not make a valid sublease for nine years? Would we hesitate to do as the lessor did, and add the consecutive estates together, in determining whether such a reversion existed as would support the nine year lease as a whole and during its entire term, in accord with the plain purpose of the parties? Or would we feel bound to cut the new lease into fragments, and make it give two landlords instead of one, and split it into two leases, especially where the amounts and modes of payment for the term were different and conflicting? And ought we to apply the rule here invoked to any case where a lawful reversion of any kind, legal or equitable, survives the end of the original lease and remains in the primary lessee?

The substantial bearing of these inquiries, even if we admit the theory of independent successive estates, which we have sought to show is unsound, is apparent in the present case. The defendant reserved the right to pay its rent by paying the Flushing Company's rents and bonded interest. It did not agree to do so, but lest the permission should be misconstrued, it expressly provided that such rents and interest should not exceed its own maximum of rent. If for the first fifty years it is bound to pay all the Flushing Company's rents for leased lines, those sums added to the bonded interest may exceed its maximum rent, and it may be forced to make default on the bonds, and bear a foreclosure or pay a greater rent than it stipulated, and find its quarterly payments falling due at times different from its own stipulations.

It seems to us, therefore, that the courts below were right in their determination that the defendant's contract was a single, complete lease and not an assignment of one lease and a creation of another and shorter one. No equity of the plaintiff compels us to a different conclusion. Her rights remain undisturbed, precisely as they were originally fixed. Simply, she does not acquire a second new and unexpected tenant after having already acquired a first one by operation of law.

It is argued, in view of the difficulties we have suggested, that this lease may be treated as such between the parties to it, and as an assignment relatively to the rights of Stewart. There seems to be some authority for that doctrine, although it is said to be exceptional. Wood, Land. & T. § 847.

If it be conceded, it goes upon an effort to preserve unbroken the intention and the rights of the parties, and should not apply where it would or might substantially change or affect them. We have seen that such might be the result in the case at bar, by compelling payment of a greater rent than that reserved, through the peril of a default on the mortgage bonds.

We do not know how the fact is, but that such a possibility was contemplated is apparent from the provision in the lease intended to protect the defendant in just that emergency. Probably the doctrine referred to goes no further than in case of an assignment to preserve to the assignor some of his contract rights, but does not make him at the same time a landlord and not a landlord.

The final result of the argument may be thus stated: The intention of the parties plainly disclosed, to make a lease, is not to be thwarted, except in a case where for want of a reversion such a lease, under the logic of the law, is impossible; and wherever such a reversion exists, sufficient to support a lease, and whether legal or equitable, the intention of the parties can be carried out, and should therefore be enforced.

The contrary conclusion plants itself upon a venerable fiction which has outlived its usefulness. A fiction in law is never to be admired, although it may sometimes be endured; but a needless and harmful fiction should go the way of its numerous fellows which have fallen before the preference for truth. The contract of lease which the parties make, which they intended to make and to which alone they bound themselves, may perhaps be resolved into a different contract, involving new liabilities, and to a party unknown to the original agreement, where some pressing need or some strong justice compels; but where there is no such compulsion, where the contract can stand as it was made, and so ought to stand as it was made, and neither necessity nor justice requires it to be thwarted or modified, I doubt the wisdom of summoning to that work an antiquated fiction which the authorities in this State have been slowly stripping of its possessions, and preparing for burial.

The cases of Collins v. Hasbrouck and Garrison v. Tift, supra, denied its application where there was any reversion in the sublessor; where there was a right of re-entry; reserved in the under lease, and where its rental terms differed from those of the primary letting. Only where it was immaterial to the new tenant under which lease he paid the same rent and possessed the same rights was the fiction of an assignment tolerated.

But in the present decision it regains its old power and begins a new reign. The doctrine which I thought should be dethroned invites to its coronation. I must be permitted to decline. Agreeing with the courts below, that the instrument in question is a sublease and not an assignment, I must vote for an affirmance of the judgment.

In a case where the right to damages because of an injunction is not disputed, and there is some evidence that all the items of damages were sustained by reason of the injunction, and that the damages were as much as allowed, this court (having nothing to do with the weight or cogency of evidence) will not interfere with the result reached in the court below.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming an order modifying and confirming as modified the report of a referee appointed to ascertain the amount of damages sustained by the defendants by reason of a temporary injunction order, granted in the cause. Affirmed.

Reported below, 32 Hun, 258.

The executors of Lyman R. Lyon entered into a contract with the owners of the Moose River Tannery for the sale of hemlock bark on the tree, situated on lands formerly belonging to decedent Lyon. The parties of the second part were to have the right to enter upon the land to cut and remove the bark, which was to be used in carrying on the Moose River Tannery. Defendant Hersey became the owner of the tannery and also of the right to cut bark under the contract. He erected another tannery near the Moose River Tannery. The old tannery was destroyed by fire and the executors notified Hersey that the contract was thereby terminated and forbade him to enter upon their land to cut bark.

Hersey claimed that his right to enter upon the land under the contract had not terminated, and that he had a right both to remove the bark already cut and to cut more. Thereupon suit was brought to have the contract declared to be at an end; to have the defendants enjoined from entering upon the lots to fell trees or peel bark, and from removing bark already peeled; that a receiver be appointed; and that an account be taken. A temporary injunction was granted; one motion to dissolve this injunction having been denied, the court subsequently dissolved it, and the case was referred to a referee to ascertain and report the damages sustained by reason of the injunction. Exceptions having been filed to the master's report, the court modified it and affirmed it as modified. Upon appeal to the general term, this order was affirmed and plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. C. D. Adams, for appellants.

Mr. N. E. Kernan, for respondents.

Per Curiam:

The right of the defendant to damages on account of the injunction is not disputed; and we see no reason to interfere with the result reached at the general term. There is some evidence that all the items of damages were sustained by reason of the injunction and that the damages were as much as allowed. We have nothing to do with the weight or the cogency of the evidence.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

v.

Peter Z. KIRKHAM, Exr., Appt.

A commission to take testimony out of the State can, under Code Civ. Proc. § 888, subd. 5, issue in a reference of a disputed claim against a decedent's estate under R. S. pt. 2, title 3, art. 2, §§ 86, 87.

(Decided June 25, 1886.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of the Special Term directing the issuing of a commission to take testimony. Affirmed.

This is a reference of a disputed claim against the estate of the decedent, by consent and with the approval of the surrogate as provided by sections 86 and 87, article 2, title 3, chap. 6, part 2, R. S.

On affidavits and due notice plaintiff made his motion for a commission to take testimony of witnesses in Utah with a stay of proceedings, etc. The application was opposed upon the ground that there was no power in the court to grant the order directing a commission to issue and that the same was unauthorized by law. The order having been granted defendant appealed to the general term where it was affirmed and he appealed to this court.

Mr. Abram J. Miller, for appellant:

I. This commission does not come within either of the cases provided for by the Code. Section 888 provides: "Such a commission may issue in either of the following cases" making five subdivisions, the fifth being: "Where an issue of fact has been joined, in an action pending in a court of record, and the testimony is material to the applicant, in the prosecution or defense thereof."

II. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice; every other remedy or prosecution is a special proceeding.

Old Code, §§ 2, 3; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3333, 3334.

This is not an action but a special proceeding under a special statute. Proceedings on the reference of a claim against an estate do not constitute an action.

III. This being a strictly statutory proceeding no power is inferred; and except it is expressly conferred by statute no proceeding can be had therein.

IV. The claimant herein has no right to a commission. A commission is not a common-law right.

Re Whitney 4 Hill, 533; Brown v. Southworth, 9 Paige, 351; McCotter v. Hooker, 8 N. Y. 504; Re Attorney, supra.

The power to issue a commission depends upon the statute.

V. A commission can issue in actions only. Wood v. Howard Ins. Co. 18 Wend. 646; Re Whitney, supra; Graham v. Colburn, 14 How. Pr. 52; McColl v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co.; Champlin v. Stodart and Re Attorney, supra.

VI. The provision of the statute, 2 R. S. 2d ed. 80, which is the same as the present statute, "that the same proceedings shall be had in all respects, the referee shall have the same powers * * * and be subject to the same control, as if the reference had been made in an action in which such court might by law direct a reference," relates to the proceedings after the report of the referee is made.

Comstock v. Olmstead, 6 How. Pr. 79.

Such Act gives no right to a commission; and being in derogation of the common law it should not be enlarged by indulging in a liberal construction.

Re Denny, 2 Hill, 220.

The language of the Act is nearly identical with that of those providing for the adjustment of the affairs of insolvent insurance companies (Laws of 1836, chaps. 3, 24); and the granting of a commission in the case of a reference under such Acts was denied.

Wood v. Howard Ins. Co., supra; Re Whitney, supra.

VII. The order granting a commission with stay is appealable.

Rathburn v. Ingersoll, 2 Jones & S. 211.

Mr. William P. Cantwell, for respondent:

I. This order is not appealable. It does not affect the substantial right within the meaning of section 190 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is in substance the same as section 11 of the old Code. It is merely an intermediate order relating to the procedure, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Van Slyke v. Hyatt, 46 N. Y. 259, 262; Arthur v. Griswold, 60 N. Y. 143; Whittlesey v. Hoguet, 66 N. Y. 353.

The appeal should be dismissed, either because this is an action and therefore the court had a conceded power to order the commission; or, on the other hand, if it is not an action, because the Code has given no right of appeal in such a case.

Section 190, subds. 2, 3. See Roe v. Boyle, 81 N. Y. 305, 307.

II. This case is clearly within the definition of the word "action" given in section 3333 of the Code.

An issue of facts has been joined within the meaning of subdivision 5, § 888.

The cases in 83 N. Y. 165; 81 N. Y. 305; and 13 Abb. N. C. 1, were undisputably special proceedings.

III. Even if this is considered a special proceeding, the plaintiff is entitled to a commission.

Section 37, art. 2 title 3, chap. 6, pt. 2, R. S. provides that "The same proceedings shall be had in all respects, the referees shall have the same powers, be entitled to the same compensation, and subject to the same control, as if the reference had been made in an action in which such court might by law direct a reference."

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The power to issue a commission to take testimony out of the State depends entirely upon statutory provisions and is regulated now by section 888 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is in substance a re-enactment of a like provision of the Revised Statutes.

Section 888 provides for the issuing of such a commission only "where an issue of fact has been joined, in an action pending in a court of record."

The appellant contends that this reference was not an action but a special proceeding; citing Roe v. Boyle, 81 N. Y., 305, 308, and Mowry v. Peet, 88 N. Y., 453; and that consequently the power to issue a commission in an action did not extend to it.

Roe v. Boyle decided that such a reference being a special proceeding, an appeal from an order made therein was governed by the provisions of the Code expressly applicable to orders in special proceedings.

In Mowry v. Peet it was held that in such a proceeding there was no power in the referee or in the court to render an affirmative judgment against the claimant on a counterclaim, for the reason that on such a reference the only question submitted to the referee was whether the claimant had a just claim against the estate of the deceased over and above all offsets; and although in trying and adjudicating upon those matters which were within the scope of the reference, the statute (2 R. S., 88, § 36) conferred upon the referee and the court the same powers as if the reference had been made in an action, yet the proceeding was not an action and no power was given to render an affirmative judgment for the executors against the claimant or to certify a balance in their favor.

As to the powers of the court and referees in such a proceeding with respect to the determination of the matter in controversy, the terms of the statute are very broad.

Section 36 provides for the entry of a rule in the supreme court or court of common pleas referring the matter in controversy; and section

37 provides that "The same proceedings shall be had in all respects, the referees shall have the same powers * * * as if the reference had been made in an action in which such court might by law direct a reference;" and the judgment of the court on the report of the referees "shall be valid and effectual in all respects as if the same had been rendered in a suit commenced by the ordinary process."

We think this provision is sufficiently broad to authorize the issue of a commission to take testimony out of the State. The necessity for such process is quite as great as in an action, and neither the executor nor the claimant should be deemed to have forfeited that advantage by consenting to such a reference. It is to a certain extent compulsory, so far as costs are concerned. § 41.

The cases of Wood v. Howard Ins. Co., 18 Wend. 646, and Re Whitney, 4 Hill 533, are cited as authorities for the proposition that the provision that in cases of reference of disputed claims against executors, etc., the same proceedings shall be had in all respects and the referees shall have the same powers as if the reference had been made in an action (2 R. S. 89 § 37) is not sufficient to authorize the issuing of a commission.

We do not think that the cases cited sustain the proposition. The references in those cases were governed by the statute in relation to the powers and duties of trustees and assignees of absconding and insolvent debtors (2 R. S. p. 40).

That statute authorized the reference of controversies relating to demands against or debts due to the debtor, and it provided (2 R. S. 45, § 24) that the referees so appointed should have the same powers as referees appointed by the supreme court in personal actions. That provision clearly did not affect the power of the court to issue a commission. It related solely to the powers of the referees.

The statute in respect to references of disputed claims against executors, etc., is much more comprehensive. It not only provides that in cases of such references the referees shall have the same powers, but it contains the further express provision that "the same proceedings shall be had in all respects" as if the reference had been made in an action. We think this includes the proceeding by commission to obtain the testimony of absent witnesses.

The order should be affirmed with costs.

CASES DETERMINED IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK.
1886.

CHIEF JUDGE,

William H. BEARD et al., Respts. *

A, learning that B was about to advertise for bids for furnishing certain articles, induced each of several dealers separately to promise him a commission on his securing a sale from such dealer to B. A did not inform any one of such dealers of the name of the intending purchaser, or that the sale was to be by competitive bidding, or that he had effected a similar understanding with other dealers. Thereafter A himself and several of said dealers submitted bids, and A brought suit for commission against the dealer who obtained the contract. Held, that he was properly nonsuited; that there was no consideration for the promise to pay him a commission; and that the agreement therefor was void by reason of the fraudulent suppression of material facts on his part, and as contra bonos mores.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the City Court of Brooklyn, affirming a judgment dismissing the complaint in an action for services. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry D. Hotchkies, for appellant:

The agreement between the plaintiff and defendants was not invalid. The case is manifestly distinguishable from that of People v. Lord, 6 Hun, 390, and is within Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288; Dutch v. Harrison, 5 Jones & S. 306; Jones v. North, L. R. 19 Eq. Cas. 428.

Agreements in restraint of free competition at public sales and the like are held void, because they operate as a fraud upon another person.

People v. Lord, supra, 394.

* A motion for reargument is pending herein, the result of which will be duly reported in case it in any way changes or modifies the reasoning or result of the present opinion. [Ed.]

The actual intent of the parties is the test. If it appears that the agreement was for a lawful purpose and from honest motives, it will be upheld.

Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288-294.

The law will not presume an agreement void or illegal or against public policy, when it is capable of a construction which will make it valid.

Curtis v. Gokey, 68 N. Y. 300.

The agreement between these parties was not intended, nor could it have had any tendency, to reduce the number of bidders or prevent the work from being let to the lowest bidder.

See Kearney v. Taylor, 15 How. 494 (56 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 787).

The agreement, at the most, made the parties joint bidders; and a joint proposal, the result of honest co-operation, although it might prevent the rivalry of the parties and thus lessen competition, is not an act forbidden by public policy.

Atcheson v. Mallon, 43 N. Y. 151.

In the cases of Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194, and Wilbur v. How, 8 Johns. * 444, the opinions were per curiam, and not well considered. These decisions have been greatly modified by the later cases.

Kearney v. Taylor, 15 How. 494-519; (56 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 787-797).

The above decisions are distinguished from the present case in Marsh v. Russell, supra.

No matter how slight the service performed by the plaintiff, such service was good consideration for the defendants' promise to pay.

Lamplough v. Brathwait, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. Part 1, * 222.

Messrs. Morris & Pearsall, for respondents:

In order to entitle plaintiff to recover, he should prove his authority to act for defendants and that his agency was the procuring cause of the sale; i. e., that he discovered the purchaser, started the negotiations between the parties and closed the bargain as the result of his agency.

Stillman v. Mitchell, 2 Robt. 528; Chilton v.

Butler, 1 E. D. Smith, 150; Goodspeed v. Robinson, 1 Hilt. 423; Holley v. Townsend, 16 How. Pr. 125; Cushman v. Gori, 1 Hilt. 356; Pierce v. Thomas, 4 E. D. Smith, 354.

Plaintiff does not even prove that he first called defendants' attention to the matter; and therefore it was proper for them to act as they did.

Wylie v. Marine Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 415; Frazer v. Wyckoff, 63 N. Y. 445; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 378.

The arrangement, as alleged by plaintiff, for both parties to bid the same amount, was void as being against public policy, there being no valid consideration on plaintiff's part for the payment to be made him.

Doolin v. Ward, 6 Johns. 194; Wilbur v. How, 8 Johns. * 444; Woodworth v. Bennett, 43 N. Y. 278; Atchison v. Mallon, 43 N. Y. 150.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claim in this case presents a novel industry and one which, if successfully carried out, would seem to become the source of profit to its prosecutors without much expenditure of time or money.

The plaintiff, a timber broker, learning that the Hamburg American Packet Company was about to build a pier requiring a large number of piles in its construction, and to advertise for bids from timber merchants to supply them, visited the several dealers in such materials in New York and Brooklyn and obtained prices therefor; and, under the inducement that he would act for them respectively in securing a sale of piles, obtained promises from each that if he secured a sale for such dealer, he should receive a commission of twenty-five cents on each pile sold. He did not inform the dealers of the name of the intending purchaser, or of the fact that a contract could be obtained only by competitive bidding, or that he had effected a similar understanding with other dealers.

The company soon thereafter issued proposals for the supply of the piles and sent invitations to dealers generally, among whom were the defendants, to compete for a contract for the piles required.

A number of persons, among whom were the plaintiff, the defendants and other dealers, submitted bids for such contract, and after a canvass of such proposals by the company's engineer, he awarded the contract to the defendants.

The defendants having refused to pay the plaintiff's claim for commissions, this action was brought to recover them.

Upon the trial, the plaintiff was nonsuited by the court below, upon the ground that there was no consideration for the promise to pay commissions.

We think the judgment was properly ordered upon that ground, and that it can also be sustained upon the ground of the fraudulent suppression of material facts by the plaintiff in making the contract, as well as that it was contra bonos mores.

The plaintiff, while assuming to act for the defendants in obtaining the contract of sale, was in fact under equal obligation to competing dealers to assist them in effecting the same sale. Thus, if the plaintiff's services could have been of advantage to anyone he was under the necessity of being treacherous to one employer or another. An agent is held to uberrima fides in his dealings with his principal; and if he acts adversely to his employer in any part of the transaction, or omits to disclose any intent which would naturally influence his conduct in dealing with the subject of the employment, it amounts to such a fraud upon the principal as to forfeit any right to compensation for services. Story, Agency, §§ 31, 334; Story, Eq. Jur. § 315; Ewell, Evans, Agency, 268; Dunlap, Paley, Agency, 105, 106; Carman v. Beach, 63 N. Y. 97, 100.

It is an elementary principle that an agent cannot take upon himself incompatible duties and characters or act in a transaction where he has an adverse interest or employment. New York Cent. Ins. Co. v. Nat. Prot. Ins. Co. 14 N. Y. 85; Ewell, Evans, Agency, 14; Greenwood v. Spring, 54 Barb. 375; Neuendorff v. World Mut. Life Ins. Co. 69 N. Y. 389.

In such a case he must necessarily be unfaithful to one or the other, as the duties which he owes to his respective principals are conflicting and incapable of faithful performance by the same person.

The plaintiff in this case was a bidder for the same contract; and if he succeeded in obtaining it himself and had not the piles to fulfill it, he was under equal obligations to several different persons to employ their piles in its performance. Some or all of his principals must have been disappointed by him and he would have been under the necessity of violating his obligations to some of his employers. Such conduct is violative of the plainest principles of morality and fair dealing and cannot be sustained by a court of justice.

Neither does the proof show that he rendered any service to the defendants in effecting the sale. His situation rendered him incapable of serving the defendants to advantage, even if he had desired to do so; but the evidence fails to show any effort on his part to sell the defendant's property. He did attempt to sell his own property or secure the contract for furnishing piles, but whether this was done for the defendants' benefit or not does not appear.

As we have seen, he was under contract obligations to others as well as to the defendants; and it does not lie in his mouth to allege that he intended to defraud others for the benefit of defendants. There was no evidence showing a performance by the plaintiff of the obligations of his contract with defendants, and he was therefore properly nonsuited on the trial.

The judgment should be affirmed.

NEW JERSEY.
COURT OF CHANCERY.

John WYCKOFF, Complainant,
v.
Alfred GARDNER et al., Exrs.

1. Payment by one surety on a sheriff's bond, of the amount of a judgment recovered thereon, under a statutory order directing the prosecution of the bond, and enforced by execution, will entitle him to contribution from his solvent cosureties.
2. The estate of a deceased cosurety is liable to make contribution, whether he died before the liability arose or after.
3. Where the surety seeking contribution holds a claim against the principal, he need not realize thereon in the first instance, but may proceed against his cosureties at once, and if he does realize anything on the claim he must share it with the cosureties who have contributed.
4. The surety seeking contribution need not make demand, nor give notice, before filing his bill.
5. A discharge in bankruptcy, prior to the accruing of the liability on which contribution is sought, will not avail a cosurety sued for contribution.

(Filed September 24, 1886.)

BILL filed by a surety on a sheriff's bond to obtain contribution from his cosureties.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. L. De Witt Taylor, for complainant.

Mr. W. H. Morrow, for executors of Wm. Gardner, deceased.

Mr. J. G. Shipman, for executors of Jos. Vliet, deceased.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions: John Gardner was elected sheriff in 1875. He gave bond with William Gardner, John Wyckoff, Samuel Frame, Joseph Vliet and Joseph B. Cornish, as his sureties thereon. He entered upon the duties of his office. April 19, 1877, W. obtained a judgment against five persons for $1,152.63, and costs $87.11. An execution was issued thereon and placed in the hands of said John Gardner as sheriff. The money was not made, although from no want of goods. The sheriff was in fault. His bond was prosecuted, and February 19, 1884, judgment was entered thereon against John Gardner, John Wyckoff (the complainant), and Samuel Frame. Prior to this action, William Gardner and Joseph Vliet had died and Joseph B. Cornish had been discharged in bankruptcy. The judgment on the bond fixed the damages and costs of W. at $1,727.28. Execution issued thereon and the complainant, one of the defendants in that suit, paid to the sheriff in discharging that writ, $1,805.83. This bill has been filed by the complainant to compel the executors of the last will of William Gardner, and the executors of the last will of Joseph Vliet, to contribute, one third each of the amount so paid by him. John

N. J.

Gardner, the principal, and Samuel Frame, one of the sureties, are shown to be insolvent.

It is first objected that there is no amercement against the defendants in the action on the bond, but only a judgment, although there was actually an order for an amercement signed. It seems quite clear to my mind, after reflection, that the judgment and execution and payment of the amount thereof are quite enough to sustain the cosurety who asks for contribution.

The bill alleges that an order was made directing the prosecution of the bond according to the statute. The answer neither admits nor denies the truth of the allegation. It is objected to as a decree because the said order is not produced and proved. If such proof were essential in a proper case, after judgment, I conclude that the answer is not of a character to put the complainant to proof.

Then again, it is objected that the twelfth section of the Act (Revis. 1100) has not been complied with, in entering the judgment. However this may be, it is not a void judgment. It may be irregular. It is a judgment on the bond given by the sheriff who was in default. It plainly determines the liability of him and his sureties who were joined in the action. The solvent surety so joined was bound, and was obliged to pay and did pay. This being done, and the proof being clear as to the relations of the parties, a claim accrued to him against his cosureties. This was according to their contract. The mutual agreement in every such case is that if one pays, all the rest will contribute. Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 246, 247.

It is urged that the bill is defective as to parties, in not bringing in the executors of William Gardner, as individuals as well as executors, and in not bringing in the administrator of a deceased legatee, instead of the legatee. It seems to have been settled that the estate of a deceased cosurety is liable to contribute whether he died before the liability arises or after. Brandt, Suretyship, § 246.

This view of the case applies alike to the executors of William Gardner and of Joseph Vliet.

It is also objected that this complainant holds a judgment which was recovered in favor of John Gardner, the principal debtor, which is of value and which the complainant has not applied as he should towards the reduction of the claim, now before the court. The evidence does not make it clear that the judgment is of any considerable value. But it seems that the complainant is not obliged in the first place to realize on such judgment. According to the weight of authority, he may proceed against his cosurety at once, and if he does realize anything, he must share it with those who have contributed. Brandt, Suretyship, § 238.

Still another objection is, that the complainant made no demand and gave no notice before filing his bill. This objection is not sustained by the authorities. Brandt, Suretyship, § 257.

The point was made that the discharge in bankruptcy of Joseph B. Cornish could not avail him in this suit, because the liability in this case did not accrue until after his discharge and, consequently, was not provable. As I read the cases, this is the law. Brandt, Suretyship, § 240 and references in note. Bump, Bankr. 6th ed. § 524. Glenn v. Howard, 3 Cent. Rep. 643.

In that case, the court held "That where the subscription price of the stock of an incorporated company is only to be paid in such installments and at such times as it may be called for, and at the time of the bankruptcy of a stockholder, and his discharge in bankruptcy, no call for the payment of his subscription has been made, a call subsequently made for an unpaid installment thereof is not a provable claim against the bankrupt's estate in the bankruptcy proceedings; therefore the bankrupt's discharge is no bar to an action for such unpaid installment." Many cases are referred to in the opinion in this case, among others that of Riggin v. Maguire, 15 Wall. 549 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 232], in which Mr. Justice Bradley, says: "But the better opinion is that as long as it remained wholly uncertain whether a contract or engagement would ever give rise to an actual duty or liability, and there was no means of removing the uncertainty by calculation, such contract or engagement was not provable under the Act of 1841." I can perceive of no method by which to take the case of Mr. Cornish out of these decisions. I therefore conclude that he is liable to contribute as cosurety.

It follows that the executors of Mr. Gardner, the executors of Mr. Vliet, and Mr. Cornish, must join in relieving the complainant. They will each be charged with one fourth of the amount paid by the complainant, with interest on such one fourth from the time of payment. But Mr. Cornish is not a party and no steps can be taken against him to compel payment. The others will pay one fourth each, and each will pay one half of the costs. I make this disposition as to costs, because it was the duty of each to share his part of the burden without suit.

I will so advise.

1. Every last will made when testator had no issue living, wherein any issue he might have is not provided for or mentioned, shall be void if, at the time of his death, he leave a child or children or issue, or leave his wife en ventre of a child or children which shall be born; and such testator shall be deemed to die intestate.
2. On the death of a purchaser of real estate, who had assumed the payment of an outstanding mortgage thereon securing a debt created by another, the land, and not the personal estate of the decedent, is primarily liable.

BILL in equity to have money paid by complainant to free, from a mortgage, land of a decedent, of which complainant, through misapprehension of the effect of the will of decedent, believed herself to be the owner, declared a lien upon the land. Decree advised.

Messrs. Babbitt & Lawrence, for complainant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The complainant is the widow of Lewis L. Coudert, who died in 1882, leaving a will, in which he gave, after the payment of his debts, all the rest, residue and remainder of his estate, real and personal, to the complainant "for herself and her heirs, absolutely and forever." It was dated and executed March 26, 1864. They had issue, seven children, five of whom are still living and were born after the making of said will and without any provisions for them in said will. Although one child was born prior to the date of the will, it died before such date; so that the testator had no child living at the time he made the will. It would therefore appear that the testator died intestate. See Revis. 1246, § 20.

At the time of his death the husband owned real estate which, when he took the title, was incumbered by a mortgage for $8,000, which mortgage he expressly assumed the payment of as part of the purchase money. The complainant, believing herself to be the owner of the land, as devisee under said will, April 1, 1864, paid said mortgage out of her own moneys, there being due thereon $8,880.44. She alleges that since then she has learned that her husband died intestate and that said lands descend to his heirs at law. Nothing else is shown.

The complainant asks the court to declare that the money so paid by her in discharge of said mortgage shall be a lien upon said lands and that the lands shall be sold to pay and satisfy her for the sum so paid. Can this be done as the case is made? It must be remembered that three or four of the defendants are infants and that it is the first duty of the court to deal in strict justice as to them, protecting their rights on every hand.

It will be seen that the debt or obligation became a personal one; Mr. Coudert by his assumption and promise to pay, made it so. Although the mortgage remained a lien on the land, and the maker of the bond was not discharged, still, under the law, Mr. C. was primarily liable. The debt was thus made a simple contract debt. Klapworth v. Dressler, 18 N. J. Eq. 68, and cases cited.

To the same effect is Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 568; Stillman's Exrs. v. Stillman, 21 N. J. Eq. 126.

It will not be denied that Mr. C. could have been compelled to pay the amount due out of his personal estate. So, too, an action would lie on his promise against his administrator.

Therefore the debt became personal. Mr. C. became personally liable. And the rule is almost universal that the personal estate of the decedent is first liable to discharge his debts. This is admitted in every case and in every book, where the question has been discussed. Yet it has been held that when the debt is not created originally by the decedent, but by another, and a mortgage on land is given as security and the decedent assumes and promises to pay it, then the personal estate is not first liable.

This doctrine was announced by Chancellor Kent, in Cumberland v. Cochrington, 3 Johns. Ch. 229, following the English authorities to which he refers. And the same doctrine has been declared in this State, in McLenahan v. McLenahan, 18 N. J. Eq. 101.

cellor Kent nor the one decided by Chancellor Zabriskie shows that the purchaser assumed and expressly promised to pay the debt, yet both cases seem to be put upon the broad ground that the land remains liable primarily, notwithstanding such assumption or any other promise or obligation short of a direct one to the mortgagee, which shows to a demonstration that it was the intention of the purchaser to charge his personal estate.

In 2 White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. Eq. 841-845 is a reference to the doctrine and to some authorities which seem to go not quite so far; but it is my duty to take the law as I find it declared and settled; and Mrs. C., having paid the mortgage debt, under the impression that she owned the entire estate, and out of her own private funds and in ignorance of the law, I think she ought not to be prejudiced thereby; but that she should have a lien on the land for the money so paid by her, and that the land should be sold to pay and satisfy such lien.

I will so advise.

John TAYLOR, Complainant,
v.

Franklin J. WOOD et al.

Although the maker of a chattel mortgage may, as between himself and the mortgagee, be estopped from denying the indebtedness purporting to be secured thereby, yet on proof that the consideration expressed in the mortgage was greater than the real indebtedness, and that the mortgage was taken to protect the maker's property from his creditors, it may be held fraudulent as to creditors.

(Filed September 29, 1886.)

SUIT by a creditor, to obtain priority over a chattel mortgage alleged to have been made by the debtor in fraud of creditor. Decree for complainant advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. D. Holt, for complainant.

Messrs. Howell & Bro., for defendant Mrs. Wood.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

This is a suit by a creditor. His insinuation is that a chattel mortgage, prior in date and of record, is fraudulent. He says the fraud consists in Mrs. Wood taking her mortgage for more than was really due her, and also for the purpose of hindering and delaying the other creditors of Franklin J. Wood, the debtor.

First, as to the consideration. The debtor, Franklin J. Wood, is a son of Sarah A. Wood, one of the defendants, and the holder of the mortgage complained of. The son and mother met in the office of a highly respectable counsel, and asked to have the mortgage drawn. When asked for what amount, it appeared to be quite uncertain what the real amount due was. After being told that Mrs. Wood would be obliged to swear the amount, and after consultation between Mrs. Wood and her son they agreed that the amount due was $900. The mortgage was drawn accordingly. There were no accounts, or notes or other memorandum kept by the mother to show the extent of the son's obligations. But C. N. Taylor was sworn. He had held some money for Mrs. Wood, and says that he paid her over $1,000 in the presence of Franklin, and understood that it was for Franklin, although it was not paid to Franklin by him, nor in his presence. He paid the money to the mother by check. But he says when he paid her the last $300 he charged her against loaning Franklin any more, and said to her in Franklin's presence that he owed her $300 already, and that he never would be able to pay that. It does not appear that Franklin then denied owing his mother that sum. Franklin, however, does now deny owing his mother this sum or anything like it. Thus upon two very important occasions the son was confronted with the charge of owing his mother; once by C. N. Taylor, of owing her over $300, and once by his mother, when she swore to the truth of the consideration expressed in the chattel mortgage, and when he was present encouraging the act by signing such chattel mortgage and conveying his goods. Clearly, as between him and his mother he is effectually estopped and bound.

But there is a charge that the mother has told another story besides the one she gave under oath, and that she too is effectually estopped and bound as to creditors. The day the mortgage was made she said to a witness that she wanted him to draw a receipt for her to sign for $350 against the mortgage, so that in case of her death his sisters could not make him pay the whole amount, because that was more than he owed her. The next day the receipt was drawn and signed by Mrs. Wood for Franklin. And in her answer, she only claims $550 as due on the mortgage. And this evidence is very clearly supported by the wife of Franklin, to whom Mrs. Wood stated that the mortgage was taken for more than was due. This statement she made to Franklin's wife the same day the mortgage was made, and very soon after.

This testimony forbids any doubt but that the mortgage was made for $350 more than the mother considered really due from her son. He may have had the money, but the mother lived with the son a good deal of the time; and no doubt upon a strict accounting the charges would not all have been on one side.

Second, as to the actual intention upon the part of the mother and son to hinder and delay the creditors of Franklin. She told her friend, who drew the receipt, that she did not want anyone to come in and take Frank's goods away from him; she said it was "to keep his creditors from selling him out." Franklin's wife says, that right after Mrs. Wood had the mortgage made, "she said that she got the chattel mortgage drawn up for $900; she said she knew it was more than Frank owed her, but she thought it would keep his creditors off; she said $900 would cover his stock and farming utensils, and if his creditors came to sell him out, her chattel mortgage claim would come in ahead." There is nothing in the case to impeach or qualify the character of these witnesses for truth.

Therefore I must conclude that the mortgage was not taken bona fide, and is fraudulent as to creditors. Sayre v. Fredericks, 1 C. E. Green, 205; Demarest v. Terhune, 8 C. E. Green, 532; De Witt v. Van Sickle, 2 Stew. 209; Schmidt v. Opie, 6 Stew. 188; Holt v. Creamer, 7 Stew. 181; Bump, Fraud. Convey. 230.

It is said that the complainant is not honestly prosecuting his claim, but is pursuing Mrs. W. only to aid Franklin. There is nothing in the testimony to justify this insinuation. It is true the son became very willing (or at least it appears so) to aid the complainant; but that does not justify the charge of a conspiracy or understanding that the litigation should be carried on for the benefit of the son.

I will advise a decree giving the mortgage of the complainant priority over that of Mrs. Wood. The complainant is entitled also to his costs.

McKEAN

v.

McKEAN.

The taking and retention, by a husband, of their engagement ring from his wife is, in connection with other facts, strong proof of a determination on his part to desert her.

(Filed September 25, 1886.)

PETITION for divorce, on the ground of desertion. Divorce advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. C. G. Garrison, for petitioner.

Mr. J. M. E. Hildreth, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

Mrs. M. filed her petition for divorce, upon the ground of desertion. The period of conjugal felicity which these parties enjoyed was measured by a few months. Mr. M. then left for Virginia, his wife and child remaining in New Jersey. He sent her a few dollars on three or four occasions; in all less than $50. He then went to Baltimore and after being there a while, he wrote Mrs. M. to come to him and sent her money for that purpose. They remained in Baltimore a short time, when she returned to her parents in New Jersey. To this period there is some uncertainty as to the true relations between them, except as to the charge by the wife that Mr. M. frequently accused her of infidelity. But after her return to her parents, he called on her and had a private interview with her. This was in November, 1882. During this interview, he asked her for her engagement ring and promised her upon his honor to return it to her. He did not return it. He left her then and took the ring with him. He says that he told her she could have it again, if she would live with him. She says that he took and kept it without any qualification whatever.

In my judgment this act of the husband in taking this ring and carrying it away, without any subsequent efforts at reconciliation, is most ample proof of a determination to separate himself from his wife and to desert her, unless it is made to appear that she was first in fault and had taken some step to sever the marital relation. I find no such fault in her conduct, although not in all respects of the highest rectitude. Why did the husband want a private interview? He asked her father for such interview. I conclude it was for the sole purpose of securing the engagement ring and of thus proving to her the entire absence of all affection or regard.

Now, in addition, see how this view is sustained by his previous conduct. He accused her repeatedly of infidelity, without the slightest proof. He repeated this charge to his and her neighbors and friends. He wrote her a vile and most insulting letter, in which the charge was again made.

But now he says he loves her and is willing and anxious to live with her as his wife. This is profession, but I am satisfied without genuine repentance. He never has gone to his wife and offered to restore the engagement ring; nor has he ever withdrawn the foul charges made both to her face and her friends. I need not go farther.

I will advise a decree according to the prayer of the petitioner, with costs.

v.

In a suit for divorce on the ground of adultery committed by the wife, she may set up by way of recrimination cruel treatment on the part of the husband.

(Filed September 18, 1886.)

BILL for divorce. Motion to strike out parts of answer. Denied.

The questions presented are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Schultz, for complainant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The bill is for divorce for adultery by the wife. The motion to strike out rests on the ground of impertinence and irrelevancy.

First. It is said that the allegation in the answer that the wife had two children by a former marriage and lived at Mauch Chunk are irrelevant. Not so in this case, since the subsequent allegation is that the husband, after his marriage with defendant, endeavored to have sexual intercourse with one of the daughters.

Second. It is said that the allegations in the answer that the husband was cruel to the defendant, not only in his open solicitations to the step-daughter, but in beating the defendant and in other cruel treatment, are impertinent and irrelevant, and, if true, constitute no defense. Not so; for how can the court grant a divorce to him who is himself liable to a charge which, if true, is the foundation for a divorce. It would be very inconsistent for the court to proceed according to the views of the complainant. It is true, the acts set up by way of defense are not such as the acts of the wife that are complained of in the bill; the bill says the wife committed adultery; the answer says the husband committed various acts of cruelty.

Under our statute both are grounds for divorce, one from the bonds of matrimony, the other from bed and board; and it seems most plain to me that, the Legislature having placed these offenses nearly on the same level, the one can as well be pleaded by way of recrimination as the other. See Grant v. Grant, 9 Stew. 502; and especially 2 Blah. Mar. & Div. chap. 5, Recrimination.

If the husband, by his treatment of his wife, has been the cause of her downfall, he should not be permitted to acquire any legal advantages thereby. He does not stand before the court with clean hands.

I think the motion to strike out should be denied.

v.

1. Where a fire insurance company which has insured mortgaged premises purchases and takes an assignment of a first mortgage thereon within a year after a loss on the premises by fire, it cannot, in a suit by a purchaser of the premises under a second mortgage, brought to have the first mortgage declared paid and removed as a cloud upon his title, set up as a defense that suit was not brought upon the policy within a year, as limited therein; the company having taken the place of the holder of the first mortgage, whose duty it was to recover the money due on the policy to the amount of his mortgage.
2. A purchaser of real estate at a judgment sale obtains no title until delivery of the deed.
3. An execution sale, subsequently declared void and set aside, is not within a provision of a policy against sales "under a levy under execution."
4. A provision in a policy, that it shall be void upon "the passing or entry of a decree of foreclosure," refers to a decree of strict foreclosure, which is an alienation; not to a decree for sale in a suit for foreclosure, which is not an alienation.
5. Where a policy is obtained by the owner of the equity of redemption, with an agreement with the first mortgagee that the money collected by him should go in satisfaction of his mortgage, the money paid by the insurance company on taking an assignment of the first mortgage must be regarded as paid on account of the insurance; and the company is not entitled to subrogation to the rights of the first mortgagee.

BILL to quiet title. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Decree canceling mortgage.

The facts of the case and the questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. F. Cahill, for complainant.

Mr. J. S. Barkalow, for defendants.

Ranney, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought under the Act "to compel the determination of claims to real estate in certain cases and to quiet the title to the same." The complainant purchased from Richard Van Ess a lot of land upon which were a dwelling house and barn. The property was conveyed to him by warranty deed dated April 26, 1882. Van Ess got his title from Mary Beebe, who with her husband conveyed to him by deed dated March 1, 1882. She got her title from Albert A. Van Voorhies, late sheriff, by deed dated February 21, 1882, under foreclosure proceedings upon a second mortgage held by her upon the property. The premises were owned in 1872 by John Koman, who on the 4th of April in that year gave a mortgage thereon (the first mortgage) for $1,000 and interest, to Thomas Gould. The complainant's title, it will be seen, is derived from the sale under foreclosure of the second mortgage. In 1880 (before the foreclosure) Harriet Pearsall owned the property. She conveyed it by deed dated March 8 in that year, to Catherine Coleman, who was the owner of it when the foreclosure took place.

On the 12th of August, 1881 (the foreclosure sale did not take place until February 10, 1882), the German American Insurance Company of New York issued a policy of insurance to Catherine Coleman against loss or damage by fire upon the dwelling house and barn and chattels, for one year, for $2,000. By the terms of the policy the loss, if any, was to be payable, first to Thomas Gould, and second to Mary Beebe (the two mortgagees) as their mortgage interests might appear. The policy was delivered to Mr. Gould, the holder of the first mortgage, and was held by him until and after February 10, 1882, the day on which the foreclosure sale took place. In the morning of that day (the sale took place in the afternoon) the house was destroyed by fire. The complainant, as before stated, bought the property April 26, 1882, about two months after the fire. Mrs. Coleman made proof of loss on or about the 18th of February, 1882, about eight days after the fire. On the 18th of July, 1882, the company through Elias Osborne, its agent and trustee in the matter, obtained from Mr. Gould an assignment of his mortgage, in consideration of the payment by it to him of the whole amount then due thereon for principal and interest; and received the mortgage and the bond and policy from him accordingly. Mr. Osborne took the assignment in his name but in trust for the company. The bill, alleging that the Gould mortgage was paid off by the company with the money due under the policy, prays a decree against Gould and Osborne and the company, declaring that they and each of them have no estate, interest or right in or to the property. In fact the suit is brought to compel the company to cancel the mortgage, upon the ground that it ought to have paid the insurance money; in which case part of it would have gone to the satisfaction of the Gould mortgage. The company insists that the complainant, who bought the property after the fire, subject to the Gould mortgage, would have no claim to the application of the insurance money, if any were due; and it also insists that no money is recoverable upon the policy, on the ground that in 1880, before the policy was issued, the property was sold and conveyed under a judgment against Catherine Coleman, to one Bridget Ann Coleman, who thenceforward until the sale was the owner thereof (so that the company insists Catherine Coleman did not own the property when the policy was issued) and that on February 10th, 1882, after the policy was issued, the property was again sold under the foreclosure proceedings to Mrs. Beebe; whereas, the policy provides that immediately upon the passing or entry of a decree of foreclosure, or upon a sale under a deed of trust or levy under execution, or if the insured shall be adjudged a bankrupt, or if the property insured shall be assigned under any bankrupt or insolvent laws, or if any change shall take place in the title or possession of the property, whether by sale transfer, conveyance, legal process or judicial decree, or if the policy before loss shall be assigned without the consent of the company indorsed thereon, or if the assured shall not be the sole, absolute and unconditional owner of the property, then and in every such case the policy shall be void. The company defends upon the further ground that the policy provides that in any case there shall be no liability on the part of the company unless suit be brought within one year from the time of making proof of loss; and the company alleges that no suit was in fact brought upon the policy within one year from February 18, 1882, when the proof of loss was made. There is proof that by a recent decree of this court, made September, 7, 1885, the deed to Bridget Ann Coleman was with the judgments, execution and levy on which it was founded, set aside, annulled and declared void; and it appears by the foregoing statement of facts that the house was destroyed by fire before the sale under the foreclosure. The complainant also offers evidence that an agent (now deceased) of the company in Paterson after the proof of loss promised to pay the loss. He insists that he is entitled to a decree declaring the mortgage satisfied. The company denies that the agent referred to had any authority to bind it to pay the loss.

The company obtained the Gould mortgage by purchase thereof from Gould, for the amount of the principal and interest due thereon. But it took with it Gould's responsibilities as holder of that mortgage towards the complainant as a subsequent purchaser of the premises for value and with warranty. When the assignment was made, which was July 18, 1882, the complainant was the owner of the property and had been such since April preceding. Mr. Gould testifies that the complainant called upon him and asked whether he, Gould, held a mortgage upon the property; and he told him he did and that he held a policy of insurance as collateral and that he supposed the policy would be paid and advised the complainant not to buy until the policy had been paid or some settlement had been made about it. He says he thinks this was before the complainant bought the property and that it was soon after the fire. But the complainant swears that he never knew that there was a mortgage upon the property until after he bought it. The conversation then, to which Mr. Gould testifies, must have taken place after the complainant had obtained title to the property and while as yet Mr. Gould held both mortgage and policy; and the question as to whether payment would be made or not under the latter was unsettled. The company then, about five months after the proof of loss had been made, purchased the mortgage and got it and the policy from Gould and has held them ever since. The complainant had no notice either from Gould or anyone else that the assignment had been made, but appears to have supposed that the mortgage had been satisfied out of the insurance money. The company, under the circumstances, cannot set up as against the complainant the defense that suit was not brought upon the policy within the year limited in the policy, because within that period the company took the place of Gould, whose duty it was to take steps to recover the money due upon the policy to the extent of the amount of the mortgage. He could have brought suit in his own name. State Ins. Co. v. Maackens, 9 Vroom, 564.

By the loss his right to so much of the insurance money as was necessary to satisfy his mortgage became vested. Nor is there anything in the case to show that the right of recovery had then been lost by the conduct of the mortgagor. The conveyance by the sheriff to Bridget Ann Coleman, although dated November 6, 1880 (the day of the sheriff's sale), was not delivered until October 7, 1881. It has, as already stated, been set aside and annulled by proceedings in this court. But apart from that fact, until the delivery of the deed, Bridget Ann Coleman had no title to the property. Den v. Steelman, 5 Halst. 193.

So that when Catherine took out the policy in 1881 she had title to the property and she had both title and possession up to the time of the fire. Under the circumstances, neither the sale nor the conveyance to Bridget Ann Coleman was a change of title, within the meaning of the condition of the policy. Nor was it a sale "under a levy under execution" within the meaning of the policy. The sale was invalid and so was the execution and the judgments on which they were founded. A void sale manifestly is not within the terms of the policy; and so too a "change of the title or possession by legal process or judicial decree," which is void, is not within its provisions. See Wood, Ins. § 326; and Strong v. Myrs. Ins. Co. 10 Pick. 40.

Catharine Coleman when she took out the policy was the legal as well as equitable owner of the property. She acquired title to it as already stated, by deed from Harriet W. Pearl to her, March 8, 1880. There is no evidence that any false representation, either verbal or written, was made to the company or its agent by her before or at the time of taking out the policy.

The policy provides that immediately upon the passing or entry of a decree of foreclosure the policy shall be void. The decree referred to in the provision is not a decree for sale in a suit for foreclosure but a decree of strict foreclosure. A decree of strict foreclosure is an alienation but a decree in ordinary foreclosure is not. It was so held in Kane v. Hibernia Mut. Fire Ins. Co. 9 Vroom. 441, in which the policy provided that a judgment in foreclosure proceedings should be deemed an alienation of the property. Under the decree in the Beebe foreclosure suit the defendants in that suit were not foreclosed until the sale, which did not take place until after the destruction of the house by fire.

No other ground of defense against liability upon the policy has been shown except those above considered. The mortgage must be held to be satisfied. The money paid for it must be regarded as so much paid on account of the insurance money. The company was not entitled to subrogation to Gould's rights on making the payment; for the policy was obtained by the owner of the equity of redemption and the premiums paid by her. The contract between her and the mortgagee was that the insurance money collected by him should go in satisfaction of his debt. There is no ground for equitable subrogation of the company. The cases in which it has been held that such right exists are either those in which the insured has himself insured his special interest as mortgagee, etc. in the property and is not bound to apply the insurance money to the payment of the debt, or cases in which although the policy was taken out by the mortgagor, the company by reason of subsequent peculiar circumstances was held to stand in the relation of a surety and to be entitled to subrogation accordingly.

Sussex Co. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Woodruff, 2 Dutch. 541, is a case of the former kind. There the mortgagee himself insured for his own benefit his interest as mortgagee, and it was held that the company on paying the loss was entitled to subrogation to his rights as mortgagee.

In Kernochan v. N. Y. Bowery Fire Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428, where a building was insured in the name of the mortgagee for his own security and that of the mortgagor, the latter paying the premium, it was held that the company was not on payment entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee.

In Matter of Kip, 4 Edw. Ch. 86, subrogation was decreed where the mortgagor had obtained the policy and assigned it to the mortgagee; but in that case the mortgagor had before loss sold the property subject to the mortgage which the purchaser had assumed to pay as so much of the consideration money of the conveyance and the purchaser had taken no assignment of his grantor's interest in the policy. See Wood, Ins. § 471; and Sheld. Sub. § 236.

In Graves v. Hampden Fire Ins. Co. 10 Allen, 281, the owner of the equity of redemption of land in pursuance of a provision in the mortgage procured a policy of insurance upon the buildings at his own expense, payable to the mortgagee in case of loss; and the policy contained a written provision that no sale of the property should affect the right of the mortgagee to recover in case of loss under the policy. The equity of redemption was afterwards sold and a loss occurred. The insurance company took an assignment of the mortgage and policy, upon paying the amount of the mortgage to the mortgagee. It was held that the purchaser of the equity of redemption was entitled to the benefit of the money so paid by the insurance company, to the amount of the policy; and might redeem the land upon paying to the company the balance due upon the mortgage after deducting the amount of the policy.

The complainant in this case is entitled to a decree that the mortgage be canceled, and he is entitled to costs.

BOUNDBROOK MUTUAL FIRE INS.
ASSO., Complainant,
v.

Emily A. NELSON et al.

*A vendor held a policy of insurance on the dwelling house standing on the premises sold; she took a mortgage for a part of the purchase money which was in excess of the amount due on the policy; she did not assign the policy at the time of the conveyance nor until after the house was burned; the company tendered the amount due on the mortgage and demanded an assignment of it, which was refused. Held, that the company was entitled to the mortgage. Held, also, that in order to carry costs it was not necessary that the company should tender the whole amount of the unpaid purchase money.

(Filed September 3, 1886.)

BILL in equity for the assignment of a mortgage. Decree advised.

Heard on bill, answer and proofs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gaston & Bergen, for complainant.

Messrs. R. V. Lindabury and J. D. Bartine, for defendants.

BIRD, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

Mrs. N. was the owner of a tract of land. The dwelling house thereon was insured in the complainant Company for $1,200. December 17, 1884, she sold and conveyed the premises to her sons George and Albert by deed with full covenants of warranty. At the same time the sons executed to her a purchase money mortgage for $1,500, being one half of the consideration money. The deed was placed in the clerk's office for record, immediately after its execution and delivery. The mortgage was executed by Albert and wife and by George, but not by George's wife, she not being present.

There is some dispute as to the precise disposition of the mortgage after it was so executed; the defendants claiming that it was delivered to Albert to be retained by him until George's wife could be produced, to join in the execution of the mortgage, and until George could raise a small portion of the consideration money to be paid by him. I do not think there is any room for doubt on this branch of the case. Without hesitation I find that the mortgage was delivered to Mrs. N. In her proof of loss she swears that she took such mortgage as part of the consideration. Having been delivered to her the transaction was complete. She being the mortgagee, she could not hold it in escrow.

The mortgage having been given for a part of the purchase money, it was not essential that the wife of the mortgagor should join in the execution.

An effort was made to sustain this branch of the defense by showing that the consideration money was not all paid by the one son or the other and that the parties intended to suspend its completion until such payment could be made. But the conduct of the parties and their relations to each other, at the time and before the delivery of the deed, very satisfactorily prove that what they did was complete in itself; and that, for what remained to be done there was the same implicit confidence that it would be done as had been exhibited before between them. For example, the mother was indebted to the one for about $700, and the other about $250, without security to either. These claims were canceled or intended to be at the time of the transaction.

The testimony is that Albert gave up his note at the time. George says that the exact amount due him from his mother was $239, and that she was to give him a note for it, but never did. He says that was to go as part payment on the farm and the balance he was to pay his mother. I repeat that to my mind it seems clear that in the law the transaction was complete between the parties.

The deed and mortgage were delivered on December 17, 1884; the house was burned on the 25th of the same month. At that time Mrs. N. held both the mortgage and the policy of insurance. The complainant admits that she had an insurable interest in the premises, to the extent of the unpaid purchase money, and from the time of proof of loss has been willing to pay her the amount of the policy. The complainant tendered to her the amount of money due upon the policy and demanded of her an assignment of her interest in the mortgage, to that extent; but she refused to make such an assignment. Upon such refusal, the Company tendered to her the amount due upon the policy, with such additional amount as represented the balance due upon the mortgage, and demanded an assignment of her interest in the bond and mortgage, which Mrs. N. also refused.

Was Mrs. N. justified in this refusal? In other words, had the Company a right, upon payment of the amount due according to the proof of loss upon the policy and the additional amount between that sum and the amount due upon the mortgage, to stand in her place? Independent of the rights of others there seems to be no doubt of its right to subrogation. Sussex Co. Mutual Ins. Co. v. Woodruff, 2 Dutch. 541; Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Allen, 43 N. Y. 389; 17 N. Y. 428; 16 Wend. 385; 13 Wall. 367 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 594]; 70 N. Y. 19.

But it is said in this case that the rights of the sons, in equity, prevent the application of the doctrine of subrogation. The claim is that the sons have the right to stand in the place of the mother, and not the Company; and that although they did not have the policy assigned and transferred to themselves and have such assignment approved, they intended to do so. The testimony leads me to the conclusion that so far as there was any intention on the part of the sons to have the policy transferred to them and then retransferred to their mother as collateral security, it was but a faint or uncertain intention. If there was any intention whatever, it was not so followed up or prosecuted as to justify the court in aiding the defendants George and Albert.

It may well be said that it is the duty of the court to aid those who otherwise suffer, when an accident intervenes and prevents them from the accomplishment of an object which they are honestly in the pursuit of diligently. But with honest intentions there must be diligence; otherwise the court will frequently aid in the commission of the greatest injustice; otherwise it will only be necessary in such cases for parties to say: "We will complete or execute the transfers by and by or at some other time" and be perfectly safe, because under the protection of the court. The doctrine contended for is salutary; but the Company against which it is sought to be applied is certainly entitled to protection, from laches.

In this case there were no steps taken by the sons, until after the house was burned, to have the policy transferred and such transfer approved. One of the by-laws of the Company is that "No transfer of any policy of insurance of the said Company shall be valid until approved by an insurance committee and certified by the secretary on the policy; in all cases of transfer new notes shall be given." These requirements were in no sense complied with and not a single step taken to show an honest and bona fide intention to comply with them. When the deed and mortgage were executed and delivered, the parties were with their counsel, at the county seat of the county in which the complainant Company is established and has always had its offices.

It seems to me that while it is competent for the court to listen to the sworn statements of parties in such cases, that it was their intention to do this or that, unless such intention is manifested and supported by some act done with all due diligence, the chances that the court will do injustice will greatly preponderate, if it be governed by such declarations. Hence, I conclude that this defense in behalf of the sons also fails.

My attention was called to the doctrine of subrogation as laid down in Wood on Fire Insurance. After a careful examination of Wood's exposition of the law and of the cases on which he rests his conclusions, I find myself unable to place these parties within either the one or the other.

Again; it was urged that the complainant, in case it was otherwise entitled to recover, was not entitled to costs as against Mrs. N. for the reason that it did not tender to her the whole amount due to her. The claim is that the amount of the mortgage, and also the difference between $239, with interest thereon for a short time, and $750 (being the whole balance of the purchase money unpaid and unsecured), should have been tendered.

As I understand the evidence, Mrs. N. made her claim for the benefit of the insurance because she held the mortgage, and not because of any vendor's lien. Making her claim on this ground, she could not expect the Company to treat or deal with her on any other ground. She might perhaps refuse to accept only a portion of her security. But it is certainly different when we consider her rights under the law respecting vendor's lien, where applied to this case. Not that there would be any difference between the rights of a mortgagee and a vendor, which I am not discussing.

But in this case Mrs. N. has herself done an act which I think prevents her from insisting that she shall not pay costs. That act was the taking of a mortgage for a portion of the unpaid purchase money, which in this case was in excess of the amount due on the policy. In so doing she had divided her lien or claim. She is now no worse off in any sense than she then was. If it was her intention to retain her lien as vendor, she still has it, notwithstanding the court may order the assignment of the mortgage to the complainant.

I think the complainant is entitled to a decree with costs, as against all of the defendants.

STATE of New Jersey

v.

SOCIETY FOR ESTABLISHING USEFUL MANUFACTURES.

1. The Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures is exempt from the tax imposed by the Act of April 18, 1884, upon the capital stock of corporations.
2. The exemption from taxation conferred by the charter of said Society extends to property of the Society, acquired under a subsequent Act of the Legislature empowering it to extend its operations by condemning additional lands for the same purposes as those provided for in its charter.

PETITION for an injunction to restrain defendant Corporation from exercising its franchises, on failure to pay taxes assessed against it under the Act of April 18, 1884. Dismissal of petition advised.

The Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures was incorporated in 1791, "for the purpose of establishing a company for carrying on the business of manufactures in this State." Soon after the granting of the charter the Society was organized, and in 1792 a situation at the Great Falls of the Passaic River was chosen as a suitable place for its operations; and by acquiring land, appropriating water rights, building dams and constructing canals it has established the immense water power which has created and supported the manufacturing interests of the City of Paterson.

The fourth section of the Society's charter (R. S. 108) is as follows: "Sec. 4. And the more effectually to encourage so useful and beneficial an establishment, Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all the lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, to the said Society belonging, shall be and they are hereby declared to be free and exempt from all taxes, charges and impositions whatsoever, under the authority of this State, whether for state or county uses or for any other use whatsoever; Provided always, That the said exemption shall not be construed to extend to the private or separate property of any member of the said corporation, in his or her individual capacity; and, as touching the lands, tenements and hereditaments of the said Society, shall continue in force for the term of ten years only, after which term it shall be lawful to lay such taxes, for the use of the State, upon the said lands, tenements and hereditaments as shall be laid upon other lands, tenements and hereditaments of like value, nature or description; Provided, nevertheless, That in case the said taxes shall be laid by way of assessment, it shall be according to a certain rate per centum, to be prescribed in the law laying such taxes, of the true and absolute value of the lands, tenements or hereditaments whereupon the same shall be laid or assessed; and shall not extend, directly or indirectly, to the moneys, goods or chattels, whether in possession or action, or to the profits real or supposed, of the said Society."

The questions raised are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. William Y. Johnson, for the State:

All taxation must relate to one of these subjects, viz.: persons, property or business.

The sovereign power of the State in respect to taxation may be exercised upon any subject within its jurisdiction, and to any extent not prohibited by the Federal Constitution.

State Tax on Foreign Bonds, 15 Wall. 819 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 179); Hagar v. Reclamation District, 111 U. S. 709 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 572); State v. Parker, 3 Vroom, 426; Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 564; Tatem v. Wright, 3 Zab. 440; State v. Newark, 2 Dutch. 519.

The State has the right to impose a tax on the business of a corporation, graduated by a percentage of the business done.

Erie R. Co. v. State, 2 Vroom, 533.

Private corporations are as much subject to the taxing power of the State as individuals, unless excepted by some paramount law or the franchise of the corporation.

Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 607 (78 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 908); State v. Berry, 2 Harris. 80; Camden & Amboy R. R. etc. Co. v. Comrs. of Appeals, 8 Harris. 72.

Double taxation is not unconstitutional; yet this power of taxation extends only to the right to subject the property of a corporation to such taxation as by the general laws of the State may be imposed on the kind of property of which it is the owner, or subject it to such taxation as corporations, as a class, are made liable.

State v. Parker, 3 Vroom, 435; Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 564.

A State has the right to tax its own citizens for the prosecution of any particular business or profession within the State.

Nathan v. La. 8 How. 73 (49 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 992); Paul v. Va. 8 Wall. 168 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 857); 1 Desty, Tax. 225-228.

The Legislature possesses the power to impose such a burden by way of a tax or license fee.

Freeholders of Essex County v. Barber, 2 Halst. 64; North Hudson County R. Co. v. Hoboken, 12 Vroom, 71; Memphis Gas Light Co. v. Tax Dist. Shelby County, 109 U. S. 898 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 976).

This Act does not violate the fundamental law as imposing an arbitrary sum upon a single corporation or making invidious distinctions.

State v. Parker, 8 Vroom, 435; State v. Yard, 18 Vroom, 357.

Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 158).

The legislative provision that "The charter of every corporation shall hereafter be subject to alteration, suspension or repeal, in the discretion of the Legislature," did not bind subsequent Legislatures so that they could not grant irrevocable contracts or charters; but it created a law which can never justly be put out of sight in determining whether any charter granted was designed to be irrevocable.

New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 352); Little v. Bowers, 17 Vroom, 304; Greenwood v. Freight Co. 105 U. S. 18 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 961).

In order to establish a legislative contract exempting from taxation, the statute must be explicit and unmistakable and without doubtful words.

Memphis Gas Light Co. v. Tax Dist. Shelby Co. supra.

Every charter granted since the passage of the sixth section of the Corporation Act is subject to alteration, amendment or repeal, although it contains no express words so declaring.

State v. Pearson, 8 Vroom, 134-566; State v. Douglass, 5 Vroom, 83; Story v. Jersey City, etc. Plank Road Co. 1 C. E. Green, 13; State v. Miller, 1 Vroom, 869; State v. Miller, 2 Vroom, 521.

The sovereign power may resume the grant of a franchise before it has been accepted and rights acquired under it.

State v. Blake, 6 Vroom, 209-215; State v. Blake, 7 Vroom, 442.

This clause has since been engrafted into the Constitution and is now the paramount law, so that even the Legislature cannot grant irrevocable charters.

Const. of New Jersey, art. IV, § VII, ¶ 11.

Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value.

The word "property" is a generic term. It includes real and personal property, tangible and intangible, visible and invisible, in its broadest sense. But it leaves to the discretion of the Legislature the designation of the particular subject or kind of property which it will select for the purpose of taxation. The selection of the subject or class having been made, the law must be general as to that class; the rule must be uniform and the assessment made according to true value.

Trustees of Public Schools v. Trenton, 3 Stew. 677, 678; State v. Newark, 10 Vroom, 390; Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 564; State v. Yard, 18 Vroom, 863; State v. Runyon, 12 Vroom, 98; Dundee Mort. Trust Invest. Co. v. School District No. 1, 19 Fed. Rep. 871.

The court will find a class of cases reported in the New York Reports, on an Act similar to the one under consideration.

A tax is uniform when it is equal upon all persons belonging to the described class upon which it is imposed.

Gallin v. Turboro, 78 N. C. 119; Burr. Tax. 147-9.

The decision in Worth v. Wilmington & Weldon R. R. Co. 89 N. C. 291, is based upon the idea that you cannot tax the same sort of corporations by two different rules: the one by gross receipts and the other upon the amount of its capital stock.

The Constitution provides that "property" shall be taxed, of which franchises are a valuable kind, although it does not require the Legislature to tax franchises, and provides no way in which franchises may be valued. A franchise has a value independent of the property actually used for the enjoyment of it, and it is possible to set a value on it.

Wilmington C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Board of Comrs. of Brunswick Co. 72 N. C. 10-15; State v. Metz, 2 Vroom, 386.

The amount of a franchise tax upon a corporation may be graduated or measured by an appraisal of the whole or any portion of the corporate property, without thereby making it a property tax. Possessing the power to impose a franchise tax to any amount it deems proper, the Legislature may measure the amount by any standard it pleases.

In the case of Reg. v. London, etc. R. Co. 41 E. C. L. 671, it was held that the company was rateable for the land improved by the profits accruing from the railway, etc.

Reg. v. Mile End Old Town, 59 E. C. L. 218.

The tax imposed by this Act is in its nature a franchise tax by way of a license fee and not a property tax.

A corporation is something besides franchises, for it has a capacity to hold as a natural body; and although it may cease to be in actu exercito, yet it may be actu signato. A corporation is an artificial body constituted of several members, like a natural body; it is united by its franchises.

Rez. v. Mayor of London, 12 Mod. 18; Sir James Smith's Case, 4 Mod. 56; London v. Vancare, 12 Mod. 271.

A corporation, as defined by the ancient common law, is a franchise created by the King and is a body constituted by policy, with a capacity to take or to do.

4 Comyn. Dig. 465, Title, Corporation.

The ordinary signification of the word "franchise," as defined by Webster, is "a particular privilege or right granted by a prince or sovereign to any individual or to a number of persons; an exemption from a burden or duty to which others are subject."

In a legal sense, franchise and liberty are used as synonymous terms; and the kinds are various and almost infinite.

2 Bl. Com. 87; Central R. R. & Bkg. Co. v. State, 54 Ga. 406-409.

It is quite too narrow a definition of the word "franchise" used in this statute, to hold it as meaning only the right to be a corporation. The word "franchise" is generic, covering all the rights granted by the Legislature.

Immunity from taxation is not a franchise. Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 185-6 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 124).

The test, whether the tax in any given case is a franchise as distinguished from a property tax, is that a tax according to a valuation is a tax on property; whereas, a tax imposed according to nominal value, or measured by some standard of mere calculation, as contrasted with valuation fixed by law itself, may be a franchise tax.

The corporations required to pay a tax under the Act in question are all corporations not hereinbefore provided for, except the ones specifically excepted from its provisions.

The exception is in the nature of a proviso, which is defined to be "something engrafted upon a preceding enactment, and is legitimately used for the purpose of taking special cases out of the general enactment."

The license fee or tax shall be measured by the amount of capital stock of such corporations.

It is contended, although the corporation has been duly organized and thereby acquired a legal existence, yet if there has been a non-user, misuser, abandonment or surrender of its corporate privileges, that it is not liable to pay the tax levied by the Act.

Mr. J. D. Bedle, for respondent.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

This being a public matter and demanding the first attention of the courts, it is proper that I should say it was not presented to the court until August 8, when it was heard, although in the midst of the summer vacation.

In 1884 the Legislature passed a law providing for the imposition of state taxes upon certain corporations, and for the collection thereof. Different corporations are enumerated and classified and the imposition to be made is fixed. Then is added: "All other corporations incorporated under the laws of this State and not hereinbefore provided for shall pay a yearly license fee or tax of one tenth of 1 per centum on the amount of the capital stock of such corporations; Provided, That this Act shall not apply to railway, canal or banking corporations, or to savings banks, cemeteries or religious corporations, or purely charitable or educational associations, or manufacturing companies, or mining companies carrying on business in this State."

The State imposed a tax on the respondent, which is resisted on two principal grounds: because it is exempt by charter, and because it is a manufacturing corporation doing business in this State. This resistance seems to be fully sustained by the several decisions of the supreme court when this same Corporation was asking to be relieved from similar burdens. See State v. Flavell, 4 Zab. 370; State v. Powers, 4 Zab. 400, 406; State v. Blundell, 4 Zab. 402. Also 3 Stew. 145, note.

However, the State claims that these decisions are no longer of force, for the reason that in 1868 the Legislature extended to the Corporation the right and power to extend its operations by condemning other lands and raising its dams, etc. There is no change in the character or attributes of the Corporation by this Act. The purpose is the same as before. It is like a railroad or canal company procuring a charter to lengthen its line. Yet the insistence upon the part of the State is that this is a new franchise; and not being exempted, it is necessarily subject to the assessment imposed under the Law of 1884. By no method can I come to this conclusion.

I think the order to show cause why an injunction should not issue restraining said Corporation from doing business should be discharged and the petition dismissed. I will so advise.

v.

AMERICAN GLUCOSE CO.

1. The exemption from taxation, under the Act of April 18, 1884, of manufacturing companies "carrying on business in this State" does not apply to a manufacturing company which has all its factories in other States, but maintains an office, sells its products and holds its business meetings in this State.
2. Under the corporation tax law, the court of chancery has only authority to grant or refuse an injunction against a corporation's continuing business after failure to pay the tax assessed against it; and a proper case for such injunction appears when the court is satisfied that the State is not wholly in the wrong.

PETITION for an injunction to restrain the defendant Corporation from exercising its franchises after failure to pay a tax assessed against it under the Act of April 18, 1884. Injunction advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. Y. Johnson, for the State.

Mr. J. D. Bedle, for respondent.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

In 1884 the Legislature passed a law providing for the imposition of state taxes upon certain corporations and for the collection thereof. Different corporations are enumerated and classified and the imposition to be made on each is fixed. Then is added: "All other corporations incorporated under the laws of this State and not hereinbefore provided for shall pay a yearly license fee or tax of one tenth of 1 per centum on the amount of the capital stock of such corporations; Provided, That this Act shall not apply to railway, canal or banking corporations, or to savings banks, cemeteries or religious corporations, or purely charitable or educational associations, or manufacturing companies or mining companies carrying on business in this State."

The State imposed a tax on the capital stock of the respondent of one tenth of 1 per centum of its capital stock. Its capital stock, according to its certificate on file is $15,000,000. The same is divided into 150,000 shares. The par value of each share is fixed at $100. The certificate then adds: "The amount with which said Company will commence business is $1,000, which is divided into ten shares of the par value of $100 each." The whole amount of its capital stock being $13,225,000 worth on the face of its own certificate, the assessment was $13,225. This tax has not been paid within the time limited by the Act. Hence, the Attorney-General asks for an injunction restraining said corporation from exercising its franchise, as by said Act he may.

The two principal objections to an order for the injunction are: that the Company is a manufacturing company and actually carrying on its business within this State and therefore exempt; and that the tax imposed is unconstitutional, because imposed upon the entire amount of capital stock named in the certificate ($13,000,000 worth) when the amount of stock actually issued is only 132,250 shares.

First: Does it carry on business in this State within the meaning of the Act? It is a manufacturing corporation. Its own statement is: "The Corporation carries on business in the State of New Jersey, and has at all times, within one year last passed; that is to say, it has a factory for the manufacture of grape sugar and glucose at Buffalo, in the State of New York, another at Leavenworth, Kansas, another at Peoria, Illinois, another at Iowa City, Iowa, and another at Tippecanoe City, Ohio. It sells the products of these factories, or some of them, at divers points within the State of New Jersey, making the sales within that State; it holds its business meetings at Camden, within the State of New Jersey, and has regularly since its organization; and it maintains an office at which to transact its business in the State of New Jersey. It purchases materials for its business within the State of New Jersey, and from time to time transports goods within the State of New Jersey, and in other ways carries on business within that State, and has from time to time since its organization."

I can see nothing in all this to bring the Company within the exception. Can the object of the law be frustrated by the agents of the Company opening an office in this State and transacting the ordinary official business of the Company there, registering the same, keeping accounts and having other agents making sales of their merchandise in the State, while all of its real or tangible capital or property of every description is far beyond the reach of the tax collector, in distant States? I think not. Doing business in this State in the legislative mind could not have been anything short of carrying on the principal work or business of the Corporation within this State; carrying on its business here in the plain and ordinary acceptance of the term, just as our bankers, potters, iron, cotton, woolen, leather and shoe manufacturers, with all their capital and all their assets here, carry on business.

If any other view than this is taken, the Legislature has indeed struggled in vain with the numerous corporations which our laws foster and protect; and its work can and doubtless will be rendered absolutely nugatory by every such institution opening an office within this State. The Legislature meant to say: if the manufacturer establishes his factory in this State, and brings here his raw material and converts it into wares, then he shall not be subject to this Act. If these things be done, then the State has other laws by which its revenues can be supplied by direct tax upon such factory or buildings, lands, goods and the like.

But it is claimed that both the Act of the Legislature and this assessment are in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which declares that "Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value." I am not prepared to say that the Act in question violates the fundamental law. I am not prepared to say but that if this Corporation had gone to the supreme court by certiorari and raised this question, that that tribunal would not have declared the law constitutional; and if it ascertained that the assessment was too great, being upon stock that had no actual existence, would not have taken steps to ascertain the true value and so secure to the State the tax justly due.

I find no authority conferred upon this court to proceed further than to grant or refuse an injunction. The statute says "That in addition to other remedies for the collection of such tax, it shall be lawful for the Attorney-General * * * whenever any tax due under this Act from any company shall have remained in arrears for the period of three months * * * to apply to the court of chancery for an injunction to restrain such corporation from the exercise of any franchise or the transaction of any business within this State until the payment of such tax and interest due thereon * * * The said court is hereby authorized to grant such injunction, if a proper case appears."

The power of this court is expressly limited to the granting of an injunction. "If a proper case appear" it may grant the writ. It seems to me that a proper case appears when the court is satisfied that the State is not wholly in the wrong. In other words, if it be doubtful whether or not, in a proper tribunal, the tax imposed, or some part of it, might be collected, then the writ should go. This leaves the parties to their legal remedies, and the Corporation can have the tax set aside if illegal or unconstitutional, and the State can have the just amount due paid if the law be sustained.

I will advise an order that an injunction do issue according to the prayer of the petition.

Re Taxation of FAURE ELECTRIC LIGHT & FORCE CO.

An injunction will not be granted under the Act of April 18, 1884, to restrain a corporation from exercising its franchises in case of nonpayment of tax, where the corporation has only kept up a formal organization without transacting any business.

(Filed October 5, 1886.)

PETITION for an injunction to restrain defendant Corporation from exercising its franchises on failure to pay taxes assessed against it under Act of April 18, 1884. Denied.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. Y. Johnson, for the State.

Messrs. Dudley & Son, for respondent.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The Statute of 1884 provides for the assessment of certain corporations, and then adds: "All other corporations incorporated under the laws of this State and not hereinbefore provided for shall pay a yearly license fee or tax of one tenth of 1 per centum on the amount of the capital stock of such corporations; Provided, That this Act shall not apply to railway, canal or banking corporations, or to savings banks, cemeteries or religious corporations, or purely charitable or educational associations, or manufacturing companies or mining companies carrying on business in this State." The respondent has been assessed under this clause. It has not paid the tax.

The same statute provides "That in addition to other remedies for the collection of such tax, it shall be lawful for the Attorney-General * * * whenever any tax due under this Act, from any company, shall have remained in arrears for the period of three months after the same shall have become payable, to apply to the court of chancery by petition in the name of the State * * * for an injunction to restrain such corporation from the exercise of any franchise, or the transaction of any business within this State until the payment of such tax and interest due thereon, and the costs of such application. * * * The said court is hereby authorized to grant such injunction if a proper case appears."

A petition has been filed in this case.

When can the court interpose? Only when a proper case is presented. Have we a case now which calls for the aid of this court by way of injunction? I think not. The facts are that although the Company has been organized for more than three years it has not transacted any business in this State or out of it. It has only attempted to preserve its organization by the election of officers as provided by law. It has gone no further than this, because it has been prohibited by injunction from other courts against the use of patents under which it expected to manufacture its wares. There is nothing in the Act that seems to carry it to such a case. In my view, the Legislature did not intend to assess the mere right or franchise independently of the business, to carry on which the franchise was granted. It is the exercise of the privilege thus granted that justifies the assessment or at least the interference of this court. The Legislature did not mean by one Act to create a corporation, or to allow a body corporate to be created, and then by another to give this court, a court of equity, the power to strangle it, while still struggling for existence.

I will advise that the order to show cause be dismissed.

Re Taxation of NEW YORK FILE & SHARPENING CO.

An injunction will not be granted under the Act of April 18, 1884, against a corporation, on failure to pay the tax assessed under that Act, where the corporation has simply preserved its organization, but is not in active operation.

(Filed October 8, 1886.)

ON petition by the Attorney-General for an injunction to restrain the New York File & Sharpening Company from exercising its franchises on failure to pay the tax assessed against it under the Act of April 18, 1884. Dismissal of petition advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. Y. Johnson, for the State.

Mr. C. M. Stabler, for respondent.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

I do not think the State has made out what the statute contemplates as a "proper case" for the interference of this court to aid in the collection of the assessments imposed on this Company. I think the court should move cautiously, for what it can do under the statute, in aid of the law courts, in collecting taxes, is in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture; that is, it can only interfere by enjoining the delinquent from transacting any business within this State. The statute confers no other power.

The facts are that this company carried on the business of manufacturing within this State, so long as it could find a market for its wares, since when it has manufactured nothing in this State or elsewhere. It was not manufacturing at the time of this assessment. It has preserved its organization, but has transacted no other business. In my judgment these facts take the case out of the statute, and consequently, the parties must be left to their ordinary remedies at law.

See also conclusions in cases of State v. American Glucose Co. filed Sep. 24, 1886 [ante, 142], and State v. Faure Electric Light & Force Co. filed Oct. 5, 1886 [ante, 148].

I will advise an order that the petition be dismissed.

v.

Thomas C. PEARCE et al.

A parol agreement to extend the time of payment of a mortgage for one year is good.

(Filed June 17, 1886.)

BILL to foreclose a mortgage. Rehearing on motion to strike out answer. Denial of motion advised.

The case is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. S. M. Schanek, for complainant, for the motion:

Part payment of a debt overdue is not a valid consideration for an agreement to postpone or discharge the payment of the residue.

Conover v. Stillwell, 5 Vroom, 54.

A bargain without a consideration is a contradiction in terms and cannot exist.

Myddleton v. Kenyon, 2 Ves. Jr. 408.

The general rule is thus stated in Chitty on Contracts, 8th Am. ed. p. 25: A valid and sufficient consideration or recompense for making, or motive or inducement to make the promise upon which a party is charged, is of the very essence of a contract not under seal, both at law and in equity; and such consideration must exist, although the contract be reduced into writing; otherwise the promise is void, and no action can be maintained thereon.

Mr. S. M. Dickinson, for defendant, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The defendant, by his answer, sets up a parol promise made by the complainant to extend the time one year for the payment of the bond which the mortgage was given to secure, to foreclose which this suit is brought, which period had not elapsed when the bill was filed. The complainant moved to strike out all that part of the answer because it showed no proper defense.

On the former hearing it seemed to me that the motion ought to prevail because the allegation exhibited no mutuality. If there was a promise on the part of the complainant to wait, on his part, there was no allegation on the part of the defendant that he also promised to wait; in other words, that he promised not to pay within the year. A further examination of the authorities, including others as well as those cited in my former* opinion, satisfies me that my former opinion was wrong.

It is my duty to advise an order setting aside the former order and denying the motion to strike out, with costs.

Re Petition of Mariah L. CRAVEN for the Appointment of a New Trustee.

A note of hand, made by one having a contingent interest in remainder in a trust fund, secured only by an agreement between the maker and the person who has a life estate in the income of the fund, pledging all their interest in the fund to the payment of the note, is a doubtful security such as a new trustee will not be compelled to accept from his predecessor.

(Filed October 5, 1886.)

ON exception to master's report. Overruled.

The facts are stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Frank B. Colton, for petitioner.

Mr. John D. Bartine, for respondent.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The master in this case reports that four of the six investments made by the former trustee are good and that two are not, and that the former should be accepted by the new trustee, but that the former trustee should be charged with the whole amount due on the two other securities. One of these two was disposed of during the hearing of the exceptions to the master's report. The other security is a note of hand for $700, given by Alfred E. Craven in 1878 and without any security whatever, except that which it is claimed arises from the agreement of said Alfred and the said Mariah L. Craven, whereby they pledge, it is said, all their interest in the fund to the payment of this note.

If the statute which directs trustees in making loans had been complied with, no question could have arisen. The statute has been disregarded. And while all courts go a great ways to protect trustees, I can find no authorities which will sustain this transaction. The loan seems to have been made to one who has a contingent interest in remainder, in the funds, upon his individual note. He was then, when he gave the note, and I think still is, insolvent. The agreement relied upon as securing the payment of the note was executed by him and the person who has the life estate, which estate is the interest on the funds held in trust.

Supposing this agreement or pledge to be valid and binding on the parties executing it, it may prove totally inadequate to secure the liability. When Mrs. Craven dies there is no longer any support for this trustee from that direction, for I understand she has no estate but the interest on these funds. And is the pledge of the remainderman adequate? It seems that all he had to pledge was this fund. And if he was insolvent when he made this pledge or agreement, may not his necessities have induced him to pledge it before, to others?

But if we take it as wholly free from such interpretation, can we say that at the time his interest falls due, it will be equal to the amount which may be due upon the note? And, supposing this too, be sufficiently answered, by what rule can any court make the protection a certainty, since the testament creating the gift gives the fund to those "who shall be living at the time of the death of the survivor" of the life tenants? These considerations would seem to be quite enough to sustain the master.

But it is reasonably doubtful whether the agreement is binding, even in a court of equity. One of the parties proposed to be bound thereby did not execute it. However this may be, I am very clear that the responsibility of enforcing it ought not to be cast on the new trustee.

To show the duty and also the liability of trustees in such a case, I refer to Perry, Trusts, § 453; Sherman v. Lanier, 12 Stew. 249; Lathrop v. Smalley's Errs. 8 C. E. Green, 192; Tucker v. Tucker, 6 Stew. 239; Ward v. Kitchen, 38 Stew. 35; Nancrede v. Voorhis, 5 Stew. 524.

I can discover no way by which the court can compel the new trustee to take this doubtful security. I will therefore advise that the master's report be sustained and the exception be overruled, with costs.

SUPREME COURT.

STATE, ex rel. Board of COMMISSIONERS OF MATAWAN,
v.

James B. HORNER, Collector.

1. Where the voters of a township have, at their regular election, fixed the amount to be raised for highways in the township for the ensuing year, and the township committee has appropriated the money, to be raised by taxation, to the several road overseers, and thereafter a part of the township votes to become an incorporated borough, the commissioners of such new borough are not entitled to the possession and control of the portion of such money raised by taxation upon the part of the township incorporated in the borough; but the same is to be expended by the township overseer as apportioned by the township.
2. The terms of the Borough Act of March 7, 1882, in relation to taxes for road purposes should be construed to extend to assessments for road purposes where no previous appropriation has been made by legal authority.

(Decided September 20, 1886.)

ON motion for mandamus to compel payment of part of taxes collected for roads in Matawan Township, to the relators. Refused.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The facts of the case and the provisions of the Act construed are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Dayton, for relators.

Mr. J. P. Applegate, for defendant.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

March 10, 1885, at the regular spring election of Matawan Township in the County of Monmouth the voters of the township fixed the sum of $700 as the amount to be assessed, collected and raised for the expenses of working the highways within the township, according to the statute, Rev. 1003, § 39.

Notice of the result of the election was posted March 11, 1885. On March 13, the township committee met and, among other business transacted, assigned and apportioned to the overseers of the highways, respectively, their several limits and divisions of the highways within the township, for opening, clearing out, working, amending and repairing. At the same meeting the money to be raised by taxation was apportioned to each district road overseer.

On March 17, part of the Township of Matawan voted to become an incorporated borough, pursuant to an Act entitled "An Act for the Formation of Borough Commissioners," approved March 7, 1882, Laws, p. 48.

This Act authorizes the inhabitants of any township or part of a township in this State, embracing an area not exceeding two square miles and containing a population not exceeding 8,000, to become a borough commission whenever a majority of the qualified voters shall so decide at a special election to be called for that purpose. It provides for the election of seven commissioners who shall have the general supervision, management and control of the public streets, sidewalks and roads of said borough, the lighting of the streets and the supplying water for extinguishing fires, with special powers given for these purposes.

April 7, 1885, commissioners were elected under section 7 of the statute, and entered on the discharge of their duties. The assessment for road tax in the Township of Matawan was made and collected by the officers of the township in the usual time and manner; and the collector of the township having these funds in hand, the Commissioners demanded that the sum of about $400, part of these taxes, be paid to their treasurer; and on refusal to pay, ask the mandatory writ of this court to compel such payment.

The only question raised by the parties is whether the Commissioners of the Borough are entitled to a portion of taxes claimed by them, or whether the overseer of the roads in the township shall have all the road money according to the apportionment made by the township committee on March 13, 1885.

Although this apportionment was made on March 13, while a notice was posted for a meeting of the inhabitants on March 17, to decide whether there should be a borough incorporation, there is nothing shown, beyond this fact, to prove that the township committee was seeking an advantage by anticipating the result of such election. Friday or Saturday following the township election is the usual time for the first business meeting of the township committees in our State. Bonds and oaths of office are then presented, road districts assigned and money apportioned to the overseers of the district. As oaths of office in some cases are required to be taken within six days after notice of election or appointment (Rev. p. 1196, § 19) and provision for special meetings to be called to fill vacancies in offices, for any cause (§ 13), is sometimes necessary, an early meeting of the township committee has been usual.

Besides this, it appears and is admitted that in the preceding year of 1884 there had been a like call for a special election, for the purpose of becoming incorporated under the Act of 1882, when the result was adverse. There was no apparent reason therefore for the officers of the township to change their customary action, or stop in the discharge of their duties, until the result of the election was known. Having taken the legal and usual proceedings in settling and apportioning the road tax for the township highways, the question to be determined is, whether the subsequent action of part of the inhabitants of the township in separating themselves from the others and establishing a borough commission annuls the act of the township committee in dividing the township into road districts and apportioning the money to be raised for road purposes to the several districts.

The legislative power to make the changes in townships, dividing them for municipal purposes, cannot be doubted. This Act is general in its application to all the townships of the State; and is not within the constitutional prohibition of passing private, local or special laws, regulating the internal affairs of town and counties. Neither is the act of the township committee, in apportioning money to the several road districts, a contract with the road districts or their respective overseers which cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation. It is merely a convenient form of providing funds for a special purpose, by legislative authority, governed entirely by the terms of the Act giving the power, which may be at any time changed or repealed, at the will of the Legislature. The remedy for any loss or inconvenience caused by such change or repeal must be sought from that body. That the Legislature may, independent of any constitutional prohibition, incorporate towns or villages within townships, for special or limited purposes, without separating the territory within the prescribed limits from the rest of the township in other respects, has been recognized in our courts. State v. Troth, 5 Vroom, 377.

We must look therefore to the words of the Act, to learn what powers the Legislature intended to confer on this new Corporation, within the limits of the larger township corporation; and how far it will supersede the prior forms of governing the entire township. If the whole township had been incorporated as a borough commission, there would be little conflict or embarrassment in adjusting the rights and duties of the borough and township officers; but as part only has been set off, a serious difficulty has arisen. The Borough Commissioners are unwilling that the township overseers of highways shall receive and expend the taxes assessed for roads on the taxable inhabitants in the Borough. The Act by which they were incorporated, read in connection with the general laws relating to townships, must govern these opposing interests.

Section 10 of the Act of 1882 defines the limitation of powers, the source and application of taxes raised for road purposes applicable to this case, in these words: "That the taxes which shall hereafter be assessed, levied and collected upon and from the taxable inhabitants of said borough, and upon the real estate therein, for roads or for the improvement or repairs of roads by the officers of the township in which said borough is situate, shall not be applied to the roads without the boundaries of said borough; but that the assessor and collector of the said township shall hereafter assess and collect upon and from the taxable inhabitants of said borough, and on all lands liable to be taxed therein, the road tax which shall have been ordered to be raised at the previous annual township election, in the same manner as the same has been heretofore assessed, levied and collected; and it shall be the duty of the collector or collectors of the township to pay over the amount of the road tax by him or them received, which shall have been assessed and collected upon the taxable inhabitants of said borough and upon all lands liable to be taxed therein, to the treasurer of the said board of commissioners, to be expended and applied by them in carrying out the purposes of this Act," etc.

The words "hereafter" and "heretofore" used in this section do not refer to the date of the enactment of the statute, but to the time when the Act becomes effective by the adoption of its terms in the several townships or parts of townships that elect to establish borough commissions.

By section 8 the clerk and the inspectors of the election shall, if a majority of votes be cast for a borough commission, "forthwith certify the result of said election and the number of votes cast for and against, under their hands, to the clerk of the county wherein said borough is situated, to be filed in his office; and from the time of filing said certificate in the office of the clerk of the county as aforesaid, the inhabitants of said borough shall be a borough commission in fact and in law, under the name," etc.

The result of the election in this case held March 17, 1885, was thus certified, and the Borough was in legal effect incorporated from that time.

Commissioners were elected on the first Tuesday of April (7th) as designated in the Act, and the sum fixed to be raised by tax for the general purposes of the Act, and within the limitation, was $500. After the date of the incorporation the taxes were assessed and collected at the usual times by the township assessor and collector.

It thus appears that prior to the incorporation of this Borough and the election of its officers, the money voted to be raised by taxation for roads had been apportioned and appropriated to the respective road districts; and that these relators, being voters, were actors in such appropriation.

Acting not for the whole township but for a portion of its inhabitants, who by their voluntary action and charged with full knowledge of what had been done by the public officers, had become incorporated, they seek to keep from the road district overseers the taxes raised for them by the votes of the entire township, and set apart for them by officers representing them.

This they should not be permitted to do unless the statute includes this case and is imperative in its terms.

In Callahan v. Township of Morris, 1 Vroom, 160, at 166, the court after citing the sections of the statute which impose duties on the township committee and other township officers, says: "It thus becomes the duty of the committee to apportion the money raised for the highways among the several overseers, to be expended in their respective districts as the committee or a majority thereof deem expedient."

It is true that it says that such apportionment should not be made within twenty days after the order for raising the money shall be passed, because the individual taxpayers have twenty days to give written notice of their election to work out the tax; but this is for the benefit of the taxpayers who make such election, and it is not competent for others to object. The court, at 167, further says: "Money may often be properly apportioned before it is in fact collected; and although the overseer is not bound to incur the expense of opening and repairing a road by hire until he has the money in hand, yet, if he thinks proper to act upon the faith of such an appropriation, he may do so. This is often done in many parts of the State without dispute or difficulty, and, with a reasonable disposition to do right, such a course is generally safe and expedient."

N. J.

This must often be done, because penalties are imposed on overseers of highways for neglect to perform the duties of their office; and by the statute (§ 57) working on the roads between the first day of October and the first day of April, except so far as may be necessary to make the road passable when obstructed by snow or rain (§ 94), is prohibited. As taxes are not collected and available before October 1, the overseers will often be without the means of repairing unless they have in hand money from the preceding year for road purposes. The apportionment of money to the road districts is therefore commonly made promptly, to ascertain the amount for each district and give assurance to the overseer upon which he may act in making and repairing roads.

As the act of the township committee of Matawan was lawful when done, it fixed the right of the road overseers to this money in controversy; and the relators being themselves actors in this appropriation by their agents, the township committee, they are not now in a position to revoke this action. The terms of the Act do not include this case and should be construed to extend to assessments for road purposes where no previous appropriation has been made by legal authority.

The mandamus is refused.

STATE, CHRISTIE, Prosecutor,

v.

MCNEAL, Collector of Bayonne.

The Act of April 25, 1884 (P. L. 1884, p. 265), providing that certain firemen "shall be entitled to have and receive the same and no other advantages in respect to taxes and jury duty as now are or hereafter may be allowed to members of the National Guard of this State," without setting out the Acts in relation to the exemption of members of the National Guard, is within the inhibition of the Constitution, that "No Act shall be passed which shall provide that any existing law or any part thereof shall be made or deemed a part of the Act, or which shall enact that any existing law or any part thereof shall be applicable, except by inserting it in such Act."

(Decided October 1, 1886.)

ON certiorari to bring up taxes assessed on the real and personal estate of the prosecutor, and also the poll tax. Assessment affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Argued before Depue and Scudder, JJ.

Mr. C. Parker, for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. W. D. Edwards, contra.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The prosecutor claims an exemption from taxation under the provisions of an Act of the Legislature approved April 25, 1884 (P. L. 1884, p. 265).

Section 72 of the Act entitled "An Act for the Organization of the National Guard of the State of New Jersey," provides that all general and staff officers, field officers, commissioned and noncommissioned officers, musicians and privates of the national guard shall be exempt from jury duty and poll and military tax during the time they shall perform military duty; and every person who shall have served seven years and been honorably discharged, shall forever after be exempt from jury duty. Rev. 691, § 71.

By section 8 of a supplement approved April 4, 1873, it was enacted that in addition to the exemption from general and special poll tax, the members of the national guard above named should be exempted from state, county and municipal taxation upon $500 during the period they should be actually serving in the national guard. Rev. 696, § 114.

The Act of 1884 is entitled "An Act to Give Certain Active and Exempt Firemen the Same Advantages in Respect to Taxes and Jury Duty as Now Are or Hereafter May Be Allowed to Members of the National Guard of this State." It enacts that all persons enrolled as active or exempt members of any fire or hose company, or hook and ladder organization, etc., who do not receive more than $150 per annum for their services, "shall be entitled to have and receive the same and no other advantages in respect to taxes and jury duty as now are or hereafter may be allowed to members of the national guard of this State."

Paragraph 4, section VII, of article IV of the Constitution as amended in 1875, provides that "No Act shall be passed which shall provide that any existing law or any part thereof shall be made or deemed a part of the Act, or which shall enact that any existing law or any part thereof shall be applicable, except by inserting it in such Act."

The prosecutor is an exempt fireman within the terms of the Act of 1884. The question arising is whether the Act conforms to the constitutional provision above cited.

The object of the constitutional provision was not to curtail or embarrass the Legislature in the enactment of laws; but the purpose was to obtain a fair and intelligent exercise of the law-making power. It has, therefore, been decided by this court and the court of errors that an Act of the Legislature which is complete and perfect in itself, the purpose, meaning and full scope of which is apparent on its face, is valid, although it may provide for actions or means for carrying its provisions into effect by reference to a course of procedure established by other Acts of the Legislature; Campbell v. Board of Pharmacy, 16 Vroom, 241, 245; S. C. sub. nom. Campbell v. Holzauer, 18 Vroom, 173; and that an Act which in itself is a complete and perfect Act of legislation may provide for ancillary proceedings to accomplish the purposes expressed in the Act, by a reference to general laws on the subject, without violating the constitutional provision. De Camp v. Hibernia R. R. Co. 18 Vroom, 43, 49.

But the Act now in hand does not come within range of the principle on which the cases cited were founded. It is an imperfect and incomplete Act of legislation. The privileges intended to be conferred are not in any manner specified in the body of the Act. No member of the Legislature called upon to cast his vote on the passage of the Act would be informed by inspection what particular rights or privileges were designed to be conferred; nor would the public by inspection be informed of the nature of the legislation about to be adopted. The Act itself grants no exemption from taxation. It simply provides that the persons designated in the Act shall be entitled to the same and no other advantages in respect to taxes as may be allowed to members of the national guard of this State. Turning to section 72 of the Act organizing the national guard and section 8 of the supplement of 1873, it will be found that members of the national guard are entitled to no exemption as members of the national guard. They are entitled to such exemption only during the time they "shall perform military duty," or "shall be actually serving in the national guard."

The Act of 1884 is not a supplement to the Act organizing the national guard, nor is the object of the Act in any sense germane to the object of the latter Act, so that the provisions of the Act of 1884 could have been inserted in the National Guard Act or in any supplement to it. The Act of 1884 stands wholly apart from the National Guard Act, in title, object and substance. It can be made efficacious only by making parts of the National Guard Act part of it. If it had provided that the seventy-second section of the Act concerning the national guard and the eighth section of the supplement of 1873 should be part of the Act or be applicable to the persons designated, the legislation would have been within the letter of the constitutional provision. In the shape in which it is placed these sections are made part of the Act, as much as if they had been expressly referred to; and such legislation is within the spirit and reason of the constitutional provision.

For this reason we think the assessment of taxes should be affirmed, with costs.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

v.

Livingston GIFFORD.

- *1. A prior mortgagee who has had possession of the mortgaged premises must account for rents and profits to the subsequent incumbrancer; but a subsequent incumbrancer in possession is not bound to account to the prior incumbrancer.
2. A mortgage which does not by its terms pledge the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises for the payment of the mortgage debt gives the mortgagee no lien on them; and the mortgagee may take them or assign them, without liability to account to the mortgagee for them.
3. Under the rule now in force, a prior incumbrancer has a right, as against the mortgagor and subsequent incumbrancers, in case his security is precarious.

ous, to have the rents of the mortgaged premises (accruing subsequent to the appointment of a receiver) sequestered for his benefit.

4. Taking possession of the mortgaged premises is a means to which a mortgagee may resort to obtain payment of his debt; and a payment obtained in this way is subject, in respect to its appropriation, to the legal rules governing the appropriation of other payments.

5. A debtor who makes a payment to his creditor, to whom he owes two or more debts, has a right to direct to which debt the payment shall be applied; if he simply hands the money over to his creditor, without direction as to its application, his creditor may apply the money as he pleases; and if neither party has exercised his right of appropriation, and a dispute subsequently arises, the court will make the appropriation; and in doing so, will, as a general rule, apply the payment to the debt which is least secure.

APPLICATION for an order to reverse the action of a master in chancery, by changing a credit of rents from a first to a last mortgage. On hearing on petition and affidavits, and answer and affidavits. Granted.

The facts of the case and the questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Brinkerhoff, for application.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

This is a foreclosure suit, and the question on which the parties are at variance is, What are their respective rights in certain rents of the mortgaged premises? The premises are subject to five mortgages. The first two and the last two are held by the defendant. The complainant holds the third, being the one standing midway between the defendant's first two and last two. The defendant took possession of the mortgaged premises, under all four of his mortgages, on the 31st of January, 1885, pursuant to an arrangement with the mortgagor. The premises were at that time in the possession of tenants under demises made by the mortgagor. The arrangement under which the defendant took possession was, so far as it is material to the question now before the court, to the following effect: the tenants were to at-torn to the defendant, he was to collect the rents, make new demises, if necessary, and out of the rents pay taxes, insurance and the cost of necessary repairs, and apply the balance to the payment of his mortgage debts in such order as he might elect. He was given power to apply the balance of the rents to either or all of his debts as he saw fit.

The complainant filed a bill to foreclose his mortgage January 7, 1886, and on the first of April following took a decree pro confesso against all the defendants, with an order of reference to a master. On the 13th of May following, he gave the defendant notice that he would on the 18th of the same month apply for the appointment of a receiver; but the master, to whom the reference had been ordered, having on the 15th of May made his report, crediting the balance of the rents remaining in the hands of the defendant on the first of May, 1886, against the amount due on the defendant's first mortgage, the notice was not pursued and no application was made.

The defendant, as was natural under the circumstances, such being the dictate of his interest, elected that the balance of rents remaining in his hands should be applied to his last mortgage; and he, accordingly, on the 6th of May, 1886, credited the same on the bond accompanying his last mortgage. The rents accruing since May 1, 1886, he concedes should be credited on his first mortgage. The complainant's mortgage does not give him a lien on the rents of the mortgaged premises, nor pledge them for the payment of the debt secured by it.

The defendant applies for an order reversing the action of the master, by changing the credit of the rents from his first mortgage to his last.

The rule is settled that a mortgagee, who takes possession of the mortgaged premises, thereby renders himself liable to be charged with their rental value; and this liability attaches to him whether he actually receives rent or not, for by taking possession he assumes the position of owner and is, in consequence, chargeable with the profit a prudent owner could have made. Dawson v. Drake, 3 Stew. 601; S. C. on appeal, Id. 733.

And it has also been held that where a mortgagee, after having taken possession, suffered the mortgagor to take the profits, without requiring him to keep down interest, although in such case he could not be charged with rents and profits, yet, inasmuch as his conduct had resulted in favor to the mortgagor and in prejudice to the subsequent incumbrancers, he should not, as against them, be permitted to recover interest on his mortgage debt during the period he had allowed the mortgagor to take the profits of the mortgaged premises. Bentham v. Haincourt, Finch, Prec. in Chan. 30; S. C. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 320; Loftus v. Swift, 2 Sch. & Lef. 655; Demarest v. Berry, 1 C. E. Green, 481.

But even in such a case, Lord Redesdale says there must be something of contrivance in the conduct of the mortgagee, or some positive misconduct on his part, to justify the court in depriving him of interest. Loftus v. Swift, 2 Sch. & Lef. 656.

A mortgage which does not, by its terms, pledge the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises for the payment of the mortgage debt, creates no lien on them and gives the mortgagee no right to them. The mortgagor, while he remains in possession, may take them and apply them to his own use, without being liable to account for them. And he may also make a valid assignment of them, in favor of a subsequent incumbrancer as against a prior incumbrancer. This was expressly decided by Chancellor Halsted, in Best v. Schermier, 2 Halst. Ch. 154.

There the mortgagor made a mortgage to one Ballentine, on lands which were already subject to prior mortgages and judgments; and also assigned the rents of the mortgaged premises to Ballentine, with authority to collect and apply them in discharge of his mortgage debt. A prior mortgagee subsequently filed a bill, alleging that the rents assigned to Ballentine should in equity be applied to the satisfaction of the prior mortgages; and praying that Ballentine be restrained from collecting them and that a receiver be appointed, in order that they might be applied as the court should thereafter direct. An injunction was granted and a receiver appointed. Ballentine, after filing his answer, moved the discharge of both orders, and they were discharged; the court holding that a mortgagor, while he remains in possession, either by himself or by his tenants, is entitled to the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises; and that, inasmuch as in this case the mortgagor himself could not have been restrained, neither would the court be justified in restraining his assignee. It is obvious that this case, as to the rents which accrued subsequent to the appointment of the receiver, was not correctly decided, according to the principle which now controls the action of the court in such cases. According to the rule now in force, a prior incumbrancer has an unquestionable right, as against the mortgagor and subsequent incumbrancers, in case his security is uncertain or precarious, to have the rents of the mortgaged premises, accruing subsequent to the appointment of a receiver, sequestered for his benefit. The case, however, in other respects is well decided and stands in perfect accord with the present course of judicial decision.

It would seem then to be entirely clear that the complainant, at the time the balance of the rents remaining in the hands of the defendant was applied by the defendant towards the satisfaction of his last mortgage, had no right to or interest in the money in controversy. It was as absolutely free from all lien or other claim on the part of the complainant as it would have been if the mortgagor had derived it from some other source than the mortgaged premises.

As between the complainant and the mortgagor, the money was the property of the mortgagor as completely and as unconditionally as it would have been if the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee had not existed between them. I regard it as entirely free from doubt that if the defendant had taken possession under either of his last two mortgages, the complainant could not have deprived him of the rents, except by the appointment of a receiver.

And so too, if the mortgagor had collected the rents himself and paid them over to the defendant, either with direction to apply them to his last mortgage or without direction, leaving the defendant free to make such application of them as his interest might dictate, there can be no doubt that the defendant would have had an unquestionable right, not only as against the mortgagor but also as against the complainant, to apply them to his last mortgage.

This case is unlike any previous case which has come under my observation, in this respect: the defendant holds mortgages both prior and subsequent to that of the complainant, and took possession under both. In all the previous cases which I have examined, the contest has been between a subsequent incumbrancer out of possession and a prior incumbrancer in possession; and not, as here, where an intermediate incumbrancer is seeking to charge an incumbrancer who took possession under liens standing both prior and subsequent to his.

The rule is well settled that a prior incumbrancer who has had possession of the mortgaged premises must account to the subsequent incumbrancer; but the converse is not true. A subsequent incumbrancer in possession is not bound to account to the prior incumbrancer. So that the case stands thus: if we treat the defendant as in possession under his first two mortgages, he is bound to account; but if we treat him as in possession under his last two, he is not. But being in under all four, the case, so far as I am aware, is without a precedent.

And yet, I think the question in dispute may be satisfactorily decided by the application of a familiar rule. Taking possession is simply a method of payment. It is one of the remedies a mortgagee may resort to, to obtain payment of his debt. It is, in its essence, a means of payment. As already remarked, if the mortgagor had remained in possession and collected the rents himself and then paid them over to the defendant he would have had a right to control their appropriation; and if he failed to exercise such right, the right of appropriation would have then belonged to the defendant, and he might have exercised it in such manner as would best protect his security. A debtor who makes a payment to his creditor, to whom he owes two or more debts, has a right to direct to which debt the payment shall be applied; if he simply hands the money over to his creditor, without direction as to its application, his creditor may apply the money as he pleases; and if neither party has exercised his right of appropriation, and a dispute subsequently arises, the court will make the appropriation; and in doing so will, as a general rule, apply the payment to the debt which is least secure. Terhune v. Colton, 1 Beas. 232; S. C. on appeal, Id. 312.

And the reason this course is pursued is that the law intends that all men shall be honest and fully perform their just obligations. The court, therefore, in making the appropriation, does that which an honest man would do. In this case, however, the mortgagor did retain possession, collect the rents and pay them over to the defendant; the mortgagor went out and the defendant entered; but the same object precisely was accomplished by that course which would have been accomplished if the other had been pursued. The rent of the mortgaged premises was applied to the payment of the mortgage debt, and to that debt which the parties desired should be first discharged. The cases do not differ in a single essential point, and the legal rule which would control the one should, in my judgment, be applied to the other. In legal substance the rents were paid to the defendant, under authority from the mortgagor, and with permission from him to the defendant to apply them as he saw fit; and the complainant, at the time the defendant made an appropriation of them, having neither a lien on them nor any right to them, has no right to have such appropriation changed.

The master's report should be corrected, by changing the credit of the rents from the defendant's first mortgage to his last.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.
SUPREME COURT.

Richard H. PORTER
v.
Stephen V. WHITE.

1. Where a bill in equity is not required by law to be sworn to, the fact that it is nevertheless sworn to does not render the party so swearing liable to the penalties of perjury for false statements contained therein.
2. In an action for malicious prosecution there must be proof of malice and a want of probable cause.
3. In such an action malice is a matter exclusively for the jury; but the question of probable cause is one of mixed law and fact, and the proper practice is for the judge to assemble such facts as in his judgment would, if proved, establish probable cause, and to say to the jury if they find these facts then probable cause existed.
4. The fact that one swears falsely does not, alone, amount to probable cause on which to base a prosecution for perjury; but that fact taken with the fact that the prosecutor acted on advice of counsel that perjury had been committed, will amount to probable cause.
5. Where the prosecutor acted upon probable cause, although from motives of malice, he is not liable for damages.

(Decided July 13, 1886.)

ON plaintiff's exceptions, taken at a trial which resulted in a verdict for defendant. New trial ordered.

Action for malicious prosecution.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. S. Henkle and J. J. Johnson, for plaintiff:

Perjury cannot be assigned upon an answer in chancery, unless the bill calls for the answer under oath.

Silver v. State, 17 Ohio, 365.

An oath to a bill in chancery must be either required or authorized by the common law or the statute or the rules of court; and any verification to a bill without such requirements would be wholly extrajudicial, and perjury cannot be assigned upon it.

People v. Gaige, 26 Mich. 32; Plath v. Braunsdorff, 40 Wis. 111.

The prosecution of a person with any other motive than that of bringing a party to justice is a malicious prosecution in law.

Stevens v. Midland Counties R. Co. 26 Eng. L. & E. 410.

In conformity with all common-law authorities, where it is proved the prosecution is without reasonable or probable cause, the jury may infer malice.

Kirksey v. Jones, 7 Ala. 622; Thompson v. Force, 65 Ill. 371; Chapman v. Cawrey, 50 Ill. 562; Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575.

The refusal of the court to grant the second instruction was error. To constitute perjury the oath or verification must be material, or be required, or have some effect in law.

4 Bl. Com. 137; People v. Fox, 25 Mich. 496; Commonwealth v. Byron, 80 Mass. 31; U. S. v. Curtis, 107 U. S. at 672-3 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 535); U. S. v. Coons, 1 Bond, 1.

The examination and discharge of the prisoner is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, sufficient to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving the contrary.

The discharge of a prisoner, by a committing magistrate, or the refusal of the magistrate to hold the prisoner over for trial is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, although counsel may have advised that plaintiff was liable to a criminal charge; and although the defendant may have communicated to counsel all the facts bearing upon the guilt or innocence of the plaintiff which he knew or by reasonable diligence could have ascertained, the prosecution was malicious.

The refusal of a grand jury to hold the accused over until trial must necessarily be very persuasive evidence that the prosecution was groundless.

Straus v. Young, 36 Md. 254; Cooper v. Utterbach, 37 Md. 316; Callahan v. Caffarata, 39 Mo. 136; Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728; Frost v. Holland, 75 Me. 112; Chapman v. Dodd, 10 Minn. 350; Thompson v. Morris, 2 Murphy, 248; Bostick v. Rutherford, 4 Hawks, 83.

Where the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the prosecutor.

Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 182.

In order for the defendant to shield himself on the ground that he obtained the advice of counsel, it must appear in evidence that he stated to counsel all the facts bearing on the guilt or innocence of the defendant which he knew or by reasonable diligence could have found out. The advice of counsel cannot be accurately said to amount to probable cause in the face of the grand jury ignoring the indictment. The ablest and most recent as well as the most ancient authorities require the utmost good faith in procuring the advice and commencing or carrying on the prosecution against another. Neither is there any conflict as to what constitutes good faith in such matters.

Sappington v. Watson, 50 Mo. 84; Sharpe v. Johnston, 76 Mo. 674; Skidmore v. Bricker, 77 Ill. 164; Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 203; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 116).

Mr. John Paul Jones, for defendant:

The only question is: Was the oath authorized, i. e., permitted? not, Was it required by law?

If the usage of the court was such as to permit the administration of an oath in the given instance, it is not extrajudicial.

The case of People v. Gaige, 26 Mich. 30, relied upon by the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with this view. That was an information for falsely swearing to a bill in equity, and the court held it bad, both at common law and under the statute. The court, however, held (p. 33) that if the presentment had shown "that the oath was authorized, if not required by the law," it would, the other averments being sufficient, have been good. The word "authorized," as here used in distinction from "required," can only mean by the "permission of or by the sanction of the law."

The same word "authorized" is used in section 5293 R. S., which defines perjury; and as there are few instances in the statutes where an oath is prescribed, it must refer to the general power of the courts to administer oaths where the ends of justice require it or the integrity of their proceedings are involved.

As to the second proposition, it is not necessary to refer to the elementary principles relating "to probable cause," "malice," etc., which are involved in this case. They are familiar to all. Attention is, however, called to the recent case of Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 197 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 120), in which those principles are applied to a case in which the circumstances were singularly similar to those in the case at bar, excepting that one was a civil and the other a criminal proceeding. In that case the supreme court held that the defendant, having acted upon the advice of counsel learned in the law, was not liable.

The defendant in this case is himself a lawyer; but before instituting the proceedings complained of, the record shows that he consulted counsel learned in the law, and was advised that it was his duty as a law-abiding citizen to bring a charge of perjury against the plaintiff.

This alone constitutes a perfect defense to an action of this character.

Cooper v. Utterbach, 37 Md. 282; Turner v. Walker, 3 Gill & J. 877; Stewart v. Sonneborn, supra; Wicker v. Hotchkiss, 62 Ill. 107.

Mr. Justice Hagner delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff Porter alleges that White falsely and maliciously and without probable cause brought against him a charge of perjury and procured his arrest; that he was taken before the police court and that his case was afterwards examined by the grand jury, who ignored the bill; and he was discharged.

At the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced evidence to show the zealous and, as he claimed and insisted, the malicious manner in which the defendant proceeded. He then introduced the subject matter of the alleged perjury, which was a bill in chancery, filed by Porter against White and others. That bill was filed to procure from the court in equity a decision that a certain assignment which Porter had made of his interest in a claim before the Mexican Commission, which was an absolute assignment, should be decreed to be but a conditional assignment. In his bill he stated that he had made an assignment to White, in form absolutely, but that really it was a security for a sum of money which White had loaned him.

The bill prayed for an answer and prayed for a decree but it did not pray for an injunction or a receiver or ne exeat. Nevertheless, it was sworn to before the clerk of the court, and that was the matter which White alleged was perjury. White's contention was that this was an absolute out and out assignment; and when he came to his defense he showed that in another controversy between all these parties Porter had sheltered himself from that suit by saying he did not have any money; that it had all been absolutely assigned. He then introduced evidence to show that the particular proceeding in which this bill was filed had been carried to a conclusion and the bill had been dismissed; and also evidence to show that he had acted on the advice of counsel in causing the arrest of the plaintiff; and disclaimed all malice whatever.

The case was sent to the jury, upon the prayers offered by both sides. As the matter stands we are obliged to rule upon the correctness of all these prayers and to give our decision accordingly, although in this case different action might have been had if the case had been differently presented.

The plaintiff asked the court first to instruct the jury that neither the law nor the rules of the court required the bill in the equity cause to be sworn to; and hence, the charge of the crime of perjury could not be assigned upon the oath thereto, although it might have been false. If the prayer had stopped there it should have been granted, as it recited a correct proposition of law. So of the third prayer. The plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that the oath made by the plaintiff to the bill filed in the equity cause was not required by law and, being extrajudicial, perjury could not be based upon it.

The second prayer is nearly right, but is lacking in technical accuracy. It is presented here in the form of an abstraction, as follows:

"The jury are instructed that to constitute the crime of perjury there must be an oath authorized by law in an issue or cause to which the facts were material, and a false statement regarding such facts upon such issue or in such cause."

The principle intended to be set forth in the second and third prayers and in the first part of the first prayer was correct. We are all of the opinion that that was not perjury. Perjury in this District may be either at the common law or it may be under that section of the statute which provides for punishment for the false swearing of any person to anything which by the statute is required to be sworn to. But neither the common-law principle nor the statute would embrace such a case as this. There is no obligation whatever on the part of a litigant to swear to a bill in equity, unless that bill asks for an injunction, ne exeat or the appointment of a receiver. Therefore it was an oath of which perjury cannot be predicated.

There is a plain reason for this. In some of the definitions of the law of perjury it appears that the oath must be an oath in injury of the rights of another. There is no way in which a false oath to a bill such as this can be considered an injury of the rights of another. If it had been a bill asking for an injunction, on which an injunction might have been granted by virtue of the bill having been sworn to, or even these other great processes granted in virtue of the bill being sworn to, then it might have been said that there was something the effect of which would result in injury to the other party.

We think it was proper, therefore, in the judge below, to reject the second and third prayers, although the second might well have been correct, because, as I say, it is a mere abstraction.

The last part of the first prayer was of such a character that the judge was authorized to reject the whole of it. After saying that perjury could not be predicated of this oath, the prayer continues:

"And if the jury find that the defendant in this cause instituted and carried on the prosecution, and that in doing so he was influenced by motives other than the bringing of a criminal to justice, they may find from these facts both want of probable cause and malice."

It seems to us that that is an improper statement of the law of the case, because it authorizes the jury to find want of probable cause from the existence of malice. Putting it the other way, if the want of probable cause appeared, then the jury might, although they are not bound to do so, infer malice but not the reverse.

The law on the subject is very well settled. It is not enough, of course, that this defendant, without authority, had the plaintiff arrested for perjury when it turned out afterwards that there was no perjury. That does not necessarily entitle the arrested man to recover. A great many prosecutions fail because the offense was not committed by the person charged or because the offense was of a character different from that charged. The failure of conviction is not of itself evidence which would subject the party who moved in the prosecution to punishment. If it were so, people would be extremely careful how they undertook to bring criminals to justice, and a great many would escape. There must be proof of malice on the part of the person who instituted the proceedings, and the jury must find a want of probable cause.

Malice is a matter exclusively for the jury; but the question of probable cause is one of mixed law and fact, and the proper practice is for the judge to assemble such facts as in his judgment would, if proved, establish probable cause; and to say to the jury if they find these facts, then probable cause existed and the defendant is exonerated, because the two, malice and probable cause, must concur in the case.

We pass to the prayers of the defendant which were granted. The first is as follows:

"To entitle the plaintiff to recover, the jury must find that in causing the plaintiff's arrest the defendant was actuated by malice; and that he acted without probable cause."

That was a perfectly correct statement of the law. The second prayer is:

"The oath taken by plaintiff on which he was arrested for perjury was in effect that the assignment of September 20, 1876 of the Parsons claim, and that of June 14, 1877, of the Standish claim, although absolute by their terms, were not intended as a sale of the claims, but as a mortgage or pledge of them as a security for money; and if the jury find that such transfers were intended as sales, then there was probable cause for the plaintiff's arrest, and he cannot recover in this action."

The effect of that prayer is that if Porter swore to what was false, then that fact alone amounts to probable cause. That is not so. It is not sufficient, as we have seen, for charging a man with perjury, to show simply that he swore to a lie. We think the court in its instruction omitted an all-important matter, namely: that although this defendant made a blunder in supposing perjury had been committed, yet if he was led into it by the advice of counsel, that placed with the fact of the false swearing would together have amounted to probable cause.

The third prayer is as follows:

"If the jury find from the evidence that before the arrest the defendant made a fair and full statement to the United States Attorney for this District, and to his counsel, learned in the law, of the facts in the case and of the oath which plaintiff had taken to the bill in chancery, and that defendant exhibited a written and sworn statement made by plaintiff, which contradicted the oath taken; and if the jury further find that the said District Attorney and counsel advised the defendant to swear out a criminal information for perjury against the plaintiff, then these circumstances may be considered by the jury as tending to show the absence of malice."

This prayer sets forth an excellent defense as to probable cause, but not as to malice.

In the case of Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 197 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 120], Mr. Justice Strong, after stating the facts of a case where a prosecuting party had received advice from his counsel, goes on to say that those facts, if believed by the jury, were a perfect defense to the action; that they constituted in law a probable cause, and being such, that malice alone, if there was such, was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover, is, in view of the decisions, beyond doubt. Snow v. Allen, 1 Stark. 502; Ravenga v. Mackintosh, 2 Barn. & Cress. 693; Walter v. Sample, 25 Pa. 275; Cooper v. Utterbach, 37 Md. 282; Olmstead v. Partridge, 16 Gray, (Mass.) 381.

"These cases, and many others that might be cited, show that if the defendants in such a case as this acted bona fide upon legal advice, their defense is perfect."

The fourth prayer is as follows:

"The finding of the general term of this court, December 24, 1883, that the assignments of Parsons against Mexico, and of Standish against Mexico, were sales and not mortgages, is evidence between these parties, until reversed, that there was probable cause for the prosecution instituted by the defendant."

If this meant that it could be so considered, the instruction was correct. If, however, it meant that the finding of the General Term was conclusive evidence of probable cause, then the instruction was incorrect.

When we come to the charge of the court to the jury we find it must have been meant in the latter sense, because at the conclusion of the charge by the court and before the jury had retired, one of the jurors asked the court: "If the jury should find that the assignments mentioned in the bill in chancery were absolute, did that constitute probable cause?" And the court answered: "In my opinion it does." That is to say that if the jury found that there was an assignment, then this defendant was justified in having the plaintiff arrested for perjury, even though it turned out afterwards that there was no perjury.

We are obliged to observe these errors and to demand the case for a new trial.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. Joseph A. SMITH,
v.
Willam C. WHITNEY et al.

This court has no jurisdiction to restrain, by writ of prohibition or otherwise, the proceedings of a naval court-martial.

PETITION for writ of prohibition. Dismissed.

The relator having been, by the Honorable William C. Whitney, Secretary of the Navy, ordered under arrest and to appear before a court-martial for trial on certain charges and specifications, applied to this court for a writ of prohibition to arrest the proceedings of the court-martial, upon the ground of want of jurisdiction in that tribunal to try and determine the matter and things charged against him.

Messrs. Hunton & Chandler, for relator.
Mr. W. A. Maury, for respondents.

Mr. Chief Justice Carter delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of the opinion that it ought not to intervene in this case. In coming to this conclusion we have not entered into the merits or demerits of the case. The relator petitions this court to stretch forth its restraining power to prevent a naval court-martial from discharging what it esteems to be its duty. The reason assigned for this request is that that duty, or whatever it is to be called, is in excess of its jurisdiction under the law and the Constitution.

Now it may be true, as argued by his counsel, that the relator has committed no offense against military propriety or authority. Whether he has or not is not the question that we are called upon to decide. The question is whether we have the power to intervene and arrest the deliberations of this naval court-martial.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Wales v. Whitney, 114 U. S. 570 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 278], which was a case in strict analogy to the case at bar, has said, in terms as explicit as the English language permits, that neither they nor we have any such jurisdiction; that while this court can deal with the consequences of a usurped jurisdiction on the part of a military tribunal, and enlarge a prisoner suffering from its extra jurisdictional power, yet we are limited to dealing with the consequences of its action and not with the process by which the consequence is produced. This is predicated on the fact that the action of that tribunal is a usurpation of authority.

It is true, as was ingeniously argued by counsel, that although this doctrine was announced by the supreme court in that case, yet it was not the central subject of issue before the supreme court, or before this court from which the appeal was taken; that the real question was whether the man was imprisoned or restrained of his liberty, not what the correlative relations of the courts were. There is a good deal of force in that argument. But still the expression of the supreme court, even though it may border upon dictum, is so elaborated in the opinion in the case that it comes to us with advisory force, and, with some of us at least on this bench, reinforced by a reason lying behind it.

In the case referred to, the supreme court says: "But neither the Supreme Court of the District nor this court has any appellate jurisdiction over a naval court-martial nor over offenses which such court has power to try. Neither of these courts is authorized to interfere with it in the performance of its duty by way of a writ of prohibition or any order of that nature. The civil courts can relieve a person from imprisonment under order of a court, only by writ of habeas corpus, and then only when it is made apparent that it proceeds without jurisdiction. If there is no restraint there is no right in the civil court to interfere."

"Its power then extends no further than to release the prisoner. It cannot remit a fine, or return to an office, or reverse the judgment of the military court. Whatever effect the decision of the court may have on the proceedings, orders or judgments of the military court, is incidental to the order releasing the prisoner. Of course, if there is no prisoner to release, if there is no custody to be discharged, if there is no such restraint as requires relief, then the civil court has no power to interfere with the military court or other tribunal over which it has by law no appellate jurisdiction." Wales v. Whitney [supra].

There the supreme court establishes the doctrine, if what I have quoted is to be regarded as judicial, that the correlation of these courts is such that we may not interfere, and even as dictum it has very good reason behind it. The English cases cited by counsel do not conflict with it, for there the tribunal appealed to had supervision of all the courts in England; it was the court of last resort and every other court was esteemed inferior to it in dignity and authority.

It is otherwise here; we have no jurisdiction over these naval tribunals, although we have jurisdiction over the consequences that they entail. They do not sit for this jurisdiction; they are not in the road of judicial bodies for this jurisdiction; they sit for the United States wherever the Secretary of the Navy ordains.

We feel that, under all the circumstances, we ought to dismiss this relation, and it is so ordered.

COURT OF APPEALS.

Ellen FLYNN and Frederick J. BROWN, Trustee, Appts.,

v.

2. A married woman must bring herself clearly within the provisions of section 7 of article 45 of the Code, to entitle her, as a feme sole trader, to hold money protected from the debts of her husband.
3. A bona fide purchaser of real estate from a married woman, with knowledge that it was acquired by her from her husband and that a suit is pending against the husband as surety on a guardian's bond, is sufficiently affected with notice to render the property in his hands liable for the amount of the judgment subsequently recovered in such suit, after the exhaustion of other property improperly acquired from her husband remaining in the hands of the wife.

5. A guardian, who is also administrator of the estate of the deceased father of his wards and who has paid claims against the estate out of his own funds, cannot charge such payments against the wards and heirs, unless the claims were duly proved against the estate and the personal estate of decedent is inadequate thereto.

(Decided March 10, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of complainants, in a suit to set aside certain deeds alleged to be in prejudice of the rights of creditors. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Robinson, Bryan, Ritchie and Irving, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. J. D. Cross and Frederick J. Brown, for appellants:

He who seeks equity must do equity.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 385-396, and cases cited.

He who comes into equity must come with clean hands.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 397-404, and cases cited.

There is an equitable estoppel upon the plaintiffs, who have acquiesced in and ratified the beneficial expenditure of money upon their property.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 801-806.

Although when a judgment at law is rendered against A and B, equity will not afford relief against it in their favor, yet when the judgment is made the basis of proceedings in equity against X and Y, strangers to the judgment, equity will, in their favor, relieve against it if it was rendered fraudulently, collusively or for an erroneous amount. The judgment is only prima facie correct when made the ground of proceedings against strangers. The failure of defendants, in the action on the guardian's bond, to come into court and make defense was equivalent to a collusive and fraudulent consent to the judgment against them.

Crane v. Barkdoll, 59 Md. 534 and the many earlier cases there cited.

The facts here show, overwhelmingly, that Mrs. Flynn is entitled in equity to be treated as creditor of husband. Her specific lien upon the property bought with her money has priority in equity over the general lien of the judgment in State, Use of Walsh, v. Walsh; Wharton v. Wilson, 60 Ind. 591.

As to Walsh's mistake as to his rights and liabilities in the guardianship matter, and the relief which a court of equity would have given to him against the vexatious proceedings either in the orphans' court or in the superior court, see 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 885, 887, and cases cited, and 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. §§ 847, 849. "Mistake as to Legal Rights," and cases cited.

Mr. M. R. Walter, for appellees:

The deed from Thomas Walsh to Ellen Flynn (being voluntary and made when Walsh, as is conceded, was insolvent) is void.

Williams v. Banks, 11 Md. 198, 227; Goodman v. Wineland, 61 Md. 451.

Mrs. Flynn claims under the deed from Thomas Walsh, and she is estopped from contradicting its recitals. She can set up no consideration other than that in the deed.

In a contest between the creditors of the husband and the wife, there is a presumption against her; and transfers of property to her are regarded with suspicion.

Bayne v. State, 62 Md. 103; Hinkle v. Wilson, 53 Md. 288.

Conceding that Mrs. Flynn earned the money, she permitted her husband to take the title in his own name, and never pretended that she made any claim to the property until this controversy arose; and there is no evidence in the case that her husband ever promised to repay her. She had a perfect right to give him the money if she pleased.

Kuhn v. Stansfeld, 28 Md. 215.

Brown stands in the place of Mrs. Flynn, and has no better title than she had. He is not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, for he knew all the circumstances under which Mrs. Flynn obtained her title.

Price v. McDonald, 1 Md. 408.

This case comes clearly within the decision of Green v. Early, 39 Md. 223.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this cause was filed by the appellees and their sisters as judgment creditors of Thomas Walsh, Patrick Flynn and John Vaughn, to get certain deeds from Patrick Flynn to his wife set aside because they were alleged to be in prejudice of the rights of his subsisting creditors. The record shows that in January, 1871, Thomas Walsh was appointed guardian for the appellees and others (children of his deceased brother, Edmond Walsh) by the Orphans' Court of Baltimore County, and, as such guardian, that he gave bond, with Patrick Flynn and John Vaughn as his securities, in the penalty of $8,000. Subsequent to such appointment and qualification as guardian, it appears that the proceeds of certain real estate sold under a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, distributed to his wards as children of his brother (whose real estate was sold), came to his hands as such guardian, and that as such guardian he charged himself therewith.

In the Orphans' Court of Baltimore County, and on the 12th day of June, 1878, by guardian accounts, passed by the court, he admitted there was then due to his wards each the sum of $814. Suit was afterwards brought on the guardian's bond against him and his sureties, and judgment was duly recovered for the sum of $814, with interest from the 21st of October, 1878, in favor of each of the wards. An execution on this judgment realized nothing out of Thomas Walsh, who had become insolvent, and only made a small part of the judgment by sale of property of Patrick Flynn and John Vaughn. The rest of the property of Patrick Flynn being alleged to have been conveyed to his wife voluntarily, and in prejudice of the rights of Flynn's subsisting creditors, and particularly the appellees, the bill in this case was filed to subject the property thus conveyed to the payment of the appellees' judgments.

On the 17th day of April, 1877, Patrick Flynn and wife executed to Thomas Walsh a deed for two pieces of property: one a house and lot conveyed to Patrick Flynn by John McManus in 1858, and the other a lot bought of Messrs. Hinkley and King, trustees, in 1870; and on the same 17th of April, 1877, Thomas Walsh, for an alleged consideration of $2,000, conveyed the same properties to Ellen Flynn, wife of Patrick Flynn. This consideration of $2,000 is conclusively proven never to have been paid, and that the conveyance was purely voluntary, although the grantee most singularly swears to having paid it to the grantor, and how it was done. These transfers were made before suit was actually brought on the guardian's bond, that suit not having been instituted until July 2, 1878. On the 27th of September, 1878, after suit was brought, but before judgment was rendered, F. J. Brown, one of the appellants, for a consideration of $1,500 actually paid Mrs. Flynn, bought and took conveyance of the property sold to Mr. Flynn by Hinkley and King, trustees, from Patrick Flynn and wife; it being alleged that Mr. Brown bought this property with a full knowledge of all the facts impeaching the validity of Mrs. Flynn's title, viz.: with a knowledge that the property came to Mrs. Flynn from her husband when he was indebted as charged in the bill, and in prejudice of creditors then subsisting, and with special knowledge of his suretyship on this guardian's bond and of the pending suit thereon. It is also claimed that he is not such a purchaser for value and without notice as will be protected in his purchase, and that the property held by him under the title described is liable to the appellees' claim. This bill was not filed until March 31, 1880, although it appears that a previous bill for the same purpose was filed in October, 1878, immediately after judgment obtained, but the same was dismissed on demurrer, because it was filed in the name of the State of Maryland.

The appellants contend,—First, that Mrs. Flynn's title is good, and is not obnoxious to the charge of having been acquired from her husband in prejudice of subsisting creditors, their contention being that both pieces of property were bought with the separate earnings of Mrs. Flynn, and that, the title having been taken in the husband's name, there was a constructive trust in her favor, and that the deed from the husband to the wife in this case was therefore but putting into her name what actually belonged to her, and was erroneously in her husband's name. Secondly, it is contended that the judgment is not conclusive as against the securities on the guardian's bond if the amount ascertained by it be actually due; and it is insisted that in fact there was nothing due the wards when the guardian's accounts were passed; that their whole estate had been expended on them or for them; and that in truth they were overpaid, and, if not overpaid, that a much smaller sum than the amount of the judgment was really due, and that the sureties are therefore entitled to have the judgment abated accordingly.

As to two of the complainants in the court below, the guardianship was contended to have been created without authority of law, they being above the age requiring a guardian when one was appointed. This point was decided in favor of the appellants in the court below, and the bill for that reason was dismissed as to them, and, as there is no appeal, we have only to deal with the appellees in whose favor decree was rendered, and the questions raised as affecting them.

John McManus conveyed to Patrick Flynn, on the 9th of April, 1858, the property in which they were living when this bill was filed. The deed calls for a consideration of $1,000 paid by the grantee. Conceding that the $1,000 used in paying for this property was Mrs. Flynn's, it was before the Code, and her husband had the right to appropriate it; and, at least with her consent, having been used in buying property in his own name, which he held in his own name for nineteen years, it must have been supposed to have been his in fact. The Code had not then been adopted, and unless money and property was expressly made separate property by the title under which it was acquired, it was not sole and separate property, and there is no proof that it was so acquired as to make it such. After having been treated as his property for so many years it would be inequitable to decide now that it had been all this while held in trust for her.

The property which was conveyed to Mr. Brown was conveyed to Patrick Flynn on the 15th of June, 1870, by Messrs. Hinkley and King, trustees. It remained in his name until the conveyance in April, 1877, to Walsh by Flynn and wife, and then immediately by Walsh back to Mrs. Flynn. The consideration for this deed is $1,200. The notes therefor were given by Flynn himself; but it is contended that the money of the wife really paid for it. This contention is attempted to be maintained by proof that the husband was rheumatic and unable to work, and that the wife's earnings went to pay for this property. It is said she kept a grocery and liquor store, and also kept boarders, and in this way she supported the family and raised the money by which her husband was enabled to buy this property. It is no doubt true that Mrs. Flynn has been a very energetic and hard-working woman, and that she has been the main prop of her husband and family, but it does not follow that all that was earned was her own and not her husband's.

By section 7 of article 45 of the Code, a married woman who, by her personal industry, skill and labor, shall earn $1,000 or less, is permitted to hold the same to her sole and separate use, protected from the debts of the husband, and that is made liable to attachment for any debt of such married woman; that is, when a married woman is trading as a feme sole. Bradstreet v. Baer, 41 Md. 28.

Under this section, at the time when the property was bought of Hinkley and King, she could only acquire and hold in that way, by her separate earnings, $1,000. Under the Act of 1882 this limitation has been taken off. In this instance, money in excess of $1,000 is sought to be declared her separate property. Manifestly, when this transaction took place, there was no thought of its being separate property. It is true, she was keeping boarders in connection with the grocery and liquor store, which was attended to by the husband and the daughter, who was large enough to attend to the store, and who did keep it, as the testimony shows, in connection with the father. It was conducted in his name and over his sign. Flynn says his wife took out the license, but it was not produced; and objection was made, and properly, to such proof without production of the license. There is not the slightest proof that she was dealing in her own name, or making debts in her own name, and that purchases were not made in the name of the husband. The sign over the door gave notice to the public that he was the proprietor, and credit was no doubt given accordingly to the person in whose name it appeared to be conducted, and in whose name the title to the property stood. The law entitles a man to the services and help of his wife and of his children, and it is only when the wife brings herself clearly within the exception that the law will protect her. The proof does not satisfy us that she was a feme sole trader, or intended to be so regarded. But if it was her money, and she allowed the husband to use it, as she might, without agreement for its restoration, she would be bound by it. Kuhn v. Stansfield, 28 Md. 215.

In this case, not only was the property bought by Mr. Flynn, and the title taken in his own name, and so continued until 1877, a period of seven years, but a lease of it for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, at a rent of $90 per year, which was to be paid to the husband, with whom also all the covenants in the lease were made, was executed. She united in that lease. If she had rights, she ought to have asserted them sooner, and not to have allowed Patrick Flynn, her husband, to obtain credit on faith of his title all this time.

That which is said in Bayne v. State, 62 Md. 107, with reference to the claim there set up on the part of the wife, is particularly applicable here. There the court said that the title being in the husband gave him credit, and formed a ground, no doubt, for accepting him as security on the guardian's bond which was then involved. That case is singularly in point, even to being a controversy over a suretyship on a guardian's bond, as this is. There is not the slightest doubt that when the transfer was made, it was requested by Mrs. Flynn for no other reason than for the purpose of saving trouble and expense in the Orphans' Court in the event of her husband's death, which she said the doctors said might come at any time. Under all the evidence, we agree with the court below that it would be an unwarrantable stretch of equitable powers to declare this property to be Mrs. Flynn's sole and separate property. If it was not hers in equity and of right before the conveyances to her through Walsh from her husband, then its acquisition from him was in prejudice of the rights of subsisting creditors, and was to such extent invalid. Code, art. 45, § 1; Williams v. Banks, 11 Md. 198; Hinkle v. Wilson, 53 Md. 288; Goodman v. Wineland, 61 Md. 451; Bayne v. State, 62 Md. 102.

We do not think that the case of Keller v. Keller, 45 Md. 269, in which a resulting trust was held to have obtained in favor of the wife, has any application here. There the money used in the purchase was the proceeds of property, undoubtedly the wife's, and the sale and exchange was made at her request. In this case, we have been unable to find that the wife's undeniable property went into any of the property bought by the husband and which was conveyed to him. All the facts and circumstances, to our apprehension, repel such an idea.

Mr. Brown bought the property in perfectly good faith, and for a valuable consideration, and believing no doubt that Mrs. Flynn's title was good, and that this claim of the appellants was no cloud on the title. Still, under all the facts, we cannot say that he was a purchaser without notice. He knew Mrs. Flynn acquired the property from her husband. That, of itself, was a suspicious fact. Green v. Early, 39 Md. 282.

This case is directly applicable. He knew of the claim of these appellants against Flynn, and knew that he was actually sued at the time on account of it. His attention was called to the fact, and judgment was obtained the next month. He certainly had enough to put him on inquiry, and that was equivalent to notice. Price v. McDonald, 1 Md. 403.

Under such circumstances, we see no escape from holding him sufficiently affected with notice to render the property in his hands liable after the exhaustion of that which actually remained in the hands of Mrs. Flynn.

We must now consider the second contention of the appellants, that, as against the securities, the appellants' claim was fully paid when judgment was obtained, or, if not, is entitled to abatement in equity in favor of the securities.

Edmond Walsh, the father of the appellees, died in Washington in May, 1867. He left a widow and four children. The children, at his death, were all minors. His widow, Mrs. Ellen Walsh, administered in Washington on his personal estate. He left a will as follows: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Ellen Walsh, the whole management of my whole property, to sell and dispose of it as she thinks proper, for the use of my four children and herself." This was all of it. Thomas Walsh, who lived in Baltimore, a bachelor brother of the deceased, and seemingly a prosperous man in business at that time, with commendable affection, stepped into the family, and, as counsel for appellants put it, acted in loco parentis. The deceased left a farm in Baltimore County, of which he took sole charge, receiving the rents, and expending, as he says, large sums of money upon it. He also, during the period of four years before he was appointed guardian, was from time to time advancing money to Mrs. Walsh; and the claim for abatement of the appellants' judgment, even to extinguishment thereof, is made up in large part of these dealings with their mother, rents of the farm, expenditures on it, and payments to her while she was in effect entitled to do with the whole estate just as she chose. Her discretion was certainly unfettered by the will. These dealings, from 1867 to 1871, between Thomas Walsh and his brother's widow, were before the sale of the farm under decree in the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, and the distribution of the proceeds between her and the children, when Mrs. Ellen Walsh's application was made.

We entirely agree with the circuit court that such dealings cannot be the legitimate subject of set-off to the appellees' claim. It might have been very generous in Walsh to do as he did; but if he was so dealing, with the expectation of subsequent reimbursement from the sale of the farm, he was not acting wisely. There is no intimation that a sale of the farm was contemplated; and if he expected to be paid at all, we do not know from the proof that he did, or how. Guardians will not be allowed to invade their ward's principal without the special authority of the courts; yet the claim here is that Thomas Walsh ought to be allowed for advances to the mother, and payments on her account, before he was appointed guardian, and before there was any property belonging to them individually and subject to guardianship. In fact, the charges are not against the appellees, but against the mother. His conduct is properly characterized by appellants' counsel as blundering; but we can see no principle upon which we can relieve him, as to what antedated the guardianship, at the cost of the appellees. Some of these claims for payments by him are alleged to be debts due by his brother at the time of his death. If the personal estate in the hands of the administrator, Walsh, was not adequate to the payment of such debts, the real estate would have been answerable; but, to entitle himself to subrogation, the debts should have been properly established, and there is no proof that they were established or proven. The heir cannot be chargeable without such proof. An account made out years ago by a person now dead, from vouchers not now produced, and exhibited with the unsatisfactory statements of Thomas Walsh about the items it contains, is the main reliance of the appellants in support of their theory of over payment by the guardian before judgment obtained. That account, as a whole, is unreliable. Large errors are conceded to be found in it; and large amounts, on account thereof, appellants confess, must be deducted from it. If it were admissible as original evidence, as it is not, we could not depend upon it for that certainty which it ought to supply as the basis of final adjustment between the parties.

The memory of Thomas Walsh with respect to the various transactions it professes to detail is dim and unsatisfactory. As to amounts and dates, appellants' counsel concede he is not clear. The very account now relied on is shown to have been before the orphans' court, and was rejected as improperly charging the wards, and the guardian account in the record was sworn to and passed instead; yet Walsh does not remember it, and says it was never before the court or examined. Mrs. Walsh, the mother of the appellees, to whom the money was paid from time to time, seems to have a much clearer recollection, and corrects Mr. Walsh in some very important particulars. She remembers certain payments distinctly, and with equal clearness denies others.

Analysis of the various items and proofs respecting them will serve no useful purpose. Acting upon the commendable concession of appellees' counsel that any payments satisfactorily proven to have been paid their mother shall be regarded as proportionately paid on their behalf, and the clear proof of payments, we will endeavor to reach the real equities between the parties since the relation of guardian and ward has existed. To do this, however, will require a new statement of the account, and on a somewhat different principle from the guardian's account.

This sum of $1,198.87 was the true amount, as against the securities, which was due when the judgment was rendered. In addition to the credits already applied, the sum of $348.47 was collected under fi. fa., on the judgment obtained. One half of that amount, or $174.23½, must be applied in part extinguishment of the sum already found as due when judgment was obtained, and interest accrued thereon.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded, to the end that the appellants shall only be required to pay the sum of $1,198.87, with interest from the date of the judgment, and the costs of the judgment, less the sum of $174.23½, part of the money realized on the fi. fa., and applicable to these appellees; and that in default of payment, the property conveyed to Mrs. Flynn, and still possessed by her, be first sold for its payment, and then, if that prove insufficient to pay the same and the costs of sale, the property conveyed to F. J. Brown, trustee of Waters' estate, shall be sold to pay the balance. A short day shall be named for the payment, and, in default, that the trustee proceed to sell in the order indicated.

Reversed and remanded.

A PPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, in favor of complainants in a bill in equity to subject devised real estate to the payment of legacies. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Robinson, Yellott and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. John M. Carter, for appellant:

There is nothing in the word "estate" to compel it to include realty. On the contrary, this court has held that even the words "all the residue of my estate" may be readily restricted to personality.

Walters v. Walters, 3 Harr. & J. 205; Beall v. Holmes, 6 Harr. & J. 205, 228; McCheaney v. Bruce, 1 Md. 347.

In the leading case of Stevens v. Gregg, 10 Gill & J. 143-147, the language of the will was almost identical with that in the case at bar; yet the court held that the bequest was not a charge upon the realty, although the testator left no personality out of which it could be paid; and the remainder of the estate was devised to the executor himself.

The appellees claim, not only that the realty must be sold to pay their legacies, but that they are also to be paid interest thereon out of its rents and profits. But these are the property of the residuary legatee under any circumstances.

Stevens v. Gregg, 10 Gill & J. 143-147 does not apply here. It is not like this case in the most essential points. The will did not contain the direction "to pay legacies out of my estate." There was no allegation and proof of insufficiency of personal estate.

Bosley v. Wyatt, 14 How. U. S. 390 (55 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed.).

There is no case against Cox v. Corkendall, 2 Beas. (N. J.) 133, ruling that the words "pay out of my estate" are an express charge upon realty.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether certain legacies in the will of Elizabeth Kauffman, deceased, are charged upon her real estate. The clauses in the will, which are important to notice are as follows:

"I will and direct my executor, hereinafter named, to satisfy and pay all my just debts and funeral expenses out of my estate. * * * I give and bequeath unto my nephew John C. Kauffman the sum of two hundred dollars; and I direct my executor, hereinafter named, to pay the same to him as soon as convenient after my decease, out of my estate. * * * I give, devise and bequeath all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real, personal and mixed, whatsoever and wheresoever, at the time of my decease, unto my niece Margaret Jane White, to her own sole and separate use, * * *," describing this last devise and bequest so as to exclude all right and interest in the same on the part of her present or any future husband.

Samuel White, the husband of the residuary devisee and legatee, was appointed executor by the will. There were several other legacies which were given in words almost identical with those which were used in the case of John C. Kauffman's legacy. It was stated that they were all to be paid, by the executor, out of the estate. The personal assets were not sufficient to pay the legacies in full; and a bill in equity was filed by the legatees, to subject the devised real estate to the payment of the deficiency.

It will be observed that in directing the payment of her debts, the testatrix uses the same language as that which is applied to the payment of the legacies. She directs her executor to pay both debts and legacies out of her estate. This court has given its approval to the authorities which hold that words which charge debts upon the realty will have the same effect when applied to legacies. Ogle v. Tayloe, 49 Md. 175.

In considering the cases which have been decided in England and in the States of this country which have followed the English authorities, we must bear in mind an important difference between the law of this State and the common law, on the subject of the payment of debts due by decedents. By the common law, the real estate of a deceased person was not liable for his simple contract debts; nor even for his specialty obligations, except where the heir was expressly bound. Hence, there was a natural and laudable desire on the part of the judges to construe wills so as to bind the lands of the testator for the payment of his debts, wherever such construction could possibly be made. They were astute in giving a meaning to general and ambiguous expressions, in order to carry into effect the just and rational purpose of paying the debts of a decedent out of his property.

But in Maryland such constructions would not be justifiable. The Act of 1785, chapter 72, makes the real estate of a deceased liable for the payment of all his debts on failure of the personalty; and it makes no difference whether he leaves a will or not, or what provisions it may contain. We have the authority of decided cases in this court for holding that words in a will declaring that the testator's debts are to be paid before devises and bequests must be regarded as immaterial and inoperative, and as not furnishing any evidence of an intention to charge the real estate; inasmuch as they simply provide what the law has determined shall be done, with or without such a clause in the will. Cornish v. Willson, 6 Gill, 815; Piper v. Tuck, 26 Md. 220.

This statute may also sufficiently explain the reason why our law on the subject of charging legacies on real estate does not adopt the decisions in England and some of the other States of the Union. It being held that the same words which would charge debts would also charge legacies, a radical difference in construction in one case would cause a corresponding difference in the other. It has been decided in New Jersey that where a legacy is directed to be paid out of the estate, it is charged on the realty. Cox v. Corkendall, 2 Beas. (N. J.) 188.

And it has been decided, in England and elsewhere, that where a testator gives legacies, and then devises and bequeaths the rest and residue of his real and personal estate, the real estate is charged with the payment of them.

The personal estate is the natural and primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies; and even when the real estate is expressly charged, no resort can be made to it until the personalty is exhausted, unless it has been exonerated by the terms of the will. If the testator gives a legacy, the law conclusively presumes that it is to be paid only out of the personalty; and if that is insufficient the legacy is lost, unless a contrary intention is shown on the face of the will. If he wishes it to be paid out of the realty, he must so state, either by express words or by fair and reasonable implication. When we look at the clauses of the will giving these legacies, we see that the executor is directed to pay them out of the estate. No portion of the real estate is devised to him; and consequently the only portion of the estate over which he has any control is the personalty. It would not be reasonable to construe the will as requiring him to pay out of the realty, when the same will has placed it beyond his reach.

It seems to us, therefore, clear that if payment is to be made by the executor it must be made out of the personalty. If we now turn our attention to the clause devising the real estate, we find that it is given to the devisee unconditionally; there is no direction or request or intimation that she shall pay the legacies. There is no reference whatever to them, except so far as it is made by the terms "rest, residue and remainder of the estate, real, personal and mixed." Giving to these words their natural interpretation, the residue of the personal and mixed estate would mean such portion of it as might remain after the debts and legacies were paid. The residue of the real estate would be a separate devise, altogether unconnected with the legacies. We do not see, therefore, how a natural construction of this clause should require us to hold that the devisee is charged with the payment of the legacies.

In Stevens v. Gregg, 10 Gill & J. 143, this court established the rule of construction which is binding on us. Certain legacies were alleged to be charged on land by virtue of the following clause in a will: "After my just debts and funeral charges are paid, to my grandsons Thomas Stephens and John Allen Stephens five hundred dollars each; to be paid unto them by my executor when they shall respectively arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and no more of my estate; the remainder of my estate, consisting of real and personal, situated, etc. * * * to my beloved son Mordecai James Allen, and to his heirs and assigns forever."

This court, adopting a decision of Chancellor Kent, in 2 Johns. Ch. 628, held that the legacies were not charged on the land. It was said: "In this case it is, we think, very clear that there is nothing in the language or disposition of the will, from which an inference can be drawn that the testator intended to charge the real estate in the hands of his devisee with the payment of these legacies. They both appear to have been equally the objects of his bounty, and it does not appear to have been his intention to incumber his lands with the payment of them." Quoting from Chancellor Kent, where he was considering the effect of a clause disposing of all the rest, residue and remainder of real and personal estate not before devised and bequeathed, it was said: "The real estate is not as of course charged with the payment of legacies. It is never charged, unless the testator intended it should be; and that intention must be either expressly declared or fairly and satisfactorily inferred from the language and disposition of the will. This general rule does not seem to admit of dispute. If that residuary clause created such a charge, the charge would have existed in almost every case, for it is the usual clause and a kind of formula in wills."

The court below passed a decree that the real estate should be sold for the payment of the legacies. It will be seen that we take a different view of the case.

Decree reversed and bill dismissed, with costs in both courts.

3. In an action of assumpsit against an administrator, his bond not being in suit, judgment should be entered for the damages laid in the declaration simply, and not for the penalty of the bond.

(Decided June 23, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Baltimore City, in favor of plaintiff, a married woman, in an action to recover for personal services in her own right. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas G. Hayes, for appellant:

The court has neither the right nor power to permit a party to alter, change or amend a bill of exception, in a material part, after the same is signed, sealed and filed, and the term has passed.

Kitchen v. Moyer, 17 Ala. 394; Heard v. Heard, 8 Ga. 380; State v. Powers, 14 Ga. 388.

There was a variance between the contract declared on in the declaration and the one proven by the husband, and hence his testimony was clearly inadmissible. The allegata and probata must always agree.

Hoke v. Wood, 26 Md. 453.

If the contract with deceased, upon which a recovery was sought, was with Lewis Hermanns and others, as is clearly shown to be the case by the evidence of Lewis Hermanns, the latter was not a competent witness in the case, under our Evidence Act.

Act 1876, chap. 222.

A notice to produce an original receipt when given at the trial, where the party had five days to comply with it, is sufficient. The witness in fact dispenses, by his own testimony, with the necessity of any time, because he says he never received such a receipt.

2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. 98, §132.

The Code provides that the administrator shall not be liable for a debt he returns good, or "separate," unless collected.

1 Code, art. 98, § 222.

Mr. Benjamin Kurts, for appellee:

What premises or what portion of premises the plaintiff's husband occupied after Mrs. Burger's death, and what rent he paid therefor to the defendant, as the agent for the owners, after her death, was matter clearly impertinent and irrelevant to the issues in this case; and contradictory evidence thereto could not be introduced for the purpose of impeaching the witness.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 449; Goodhand v. Benton, 6 Gill & J. 481; Sloan v. Edwards, 61 Md. 105.

This immaterial testimony was elicited from the witness Hermanns, upon his cross examination, by the defendant, and it is not competent for the defendant to contradict him; the defendant is bound by his answer.

2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. § 277; 6 Gill & J. 481.

In an action against an administrator by a married woman, suing by her husband as her next friend, the husband is a competent witness in her behalf, he being only a nominal party within the meaning of the Evidence Act.

Trahern v. Colburn, 68 Md. 99.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Johanna Hermanns, by her husband and next friend, Lewis Hermanns, against the appellant, administrator c. t. a. of Margaretha Burger, deceased. The declaration contains the money counts for goods bargained and sold, work and material provided, for money lent, for money paid for decedent, for money had and received by decedent to plaintiff's use, and for money found to be due on accounts stated between them; and also a special count for washing and ironing done by the plaintiff for the deceased, and for services as nurse and attendant from the first of October, 1872, to the thirty-first of March, 1884. Appended to the narr. is an account in which plaintiff claims from the first of October, 1872, to April 16, 1880, at $2 per week; and from April 16, 1880, to March 31, 1884, at $5 per week.

The 7th section of article 45 of the Code says: "Any married woman who, by skill, industry and personal labor, shall earn any money or other property, real, personal or mixed, shall hold the same, and the fruits, increase and profits thereof, to her sole and separate use, with power of a feme sole to invest and reinvest, sell and dispose of the same."

At common law the husband is unqualifiedly entitled to his wife's services, and the profits of her labor. By this section of the Code a married woman may engage in business independently of her husband, or may, apart from him, do any kind of work or labor on her own account, and for her separate benefit, so that the proceeds of her business and the wages of her labor shall become her sole and separate property. For the recovery and protection of such property she may, by other provisions of the Code, sue by next friend. This suit proceeds on the theory that what is claimed is due the wife as separate property, and the suit is brought by the husband as next friend. To recover, the plaintiff must show that she was rendering the service sued for as an independent person, on her own account, and not conjointly with or for her husband's benefit.

The first exception is to the admission of evidence which it is claimed has no tendency to establish the plaintiff's claim. Issues have been joined upon pleas that the defendant was never indebted, and that the decedent was never indebted, and never promised, as alleged; that the action did not accrue within three years before suit brought, and that the assets of the estate are not sufficient to pay all the decedent's debts in full. To be admissible the testimony must tend to prove some one of these issues. The witness is Lewis Hermanns, the plaintiff's next friend and husband. Being merely the next friend, he was a nominal party only to this suit, and competent under the Evidence Acts. The question is, Do his statements tend to sustain the claim as made on any of the issues framed? Hermanns states that he rented the house from Mrs. Burger, the defendant's testatrix, at $13 per month, and that Mrs. Burger was to move out and give him possession of the whole house; but that she did not move out, and afterwards agreed to pay him $4 per month for the rooms she retained. He further states that he paid her for the rent of the whole house, and for two months she paid him for the rooms occupied by her, and then that she was taken sick, and when he went to pay the rent, "she tells us she would pay us for good and well if we take care of her; I let the rent slip." It is evident that this testimony can have no bearing on any of the issues, unless it be the indebtedness; and we think it plain that it does not tend to show that Mrs. Burger contracted with the wife to do anything for her, or that the wife did render any service for her or on her own account and independently of the husband. It tends to show that Mrs. Burger was to receive full pay for house rent, and was to remain in it and be cared for by witness and somebody else, and that she promised witness to pay them well for such attention. It may be assumed that by "we" and "us," in his statement, he means himself and his wife. According to this evidence, he was furnishing a home and shelter for Mrs. Burger at his cost, and certain care and attention was to be rendered, for which he says she said she would pay "us." It was the husband's right that the wife should work with and for him, and it was natural that she should; and if she did he was entitled to pay. In such case there is no division of proceeds, as between partners in business. It was lawful for the wife to engage in labor for her own benefit, and independent of her husband, if she chose; but unless she did so, and intended the proceeds for her own separate use, the husband was entitled to the profits of her labor. This is certainly the common-law rule. 1 Chit. Pl. 80, and authorities there cited.

If the wife desires to bring herself within the exception and provisions of the seventh article of the Code, the evidence must be such as to bring her strictly within its meaning and protection. Flynn v. Walsh, [ante, 155.]

This seventh section certainly did not intend to divorce husband and wife, whether they would have it so or not, and to make all that the wife did inure to her own use only, without any regard for the husband's rights. From their relation as husband and wife she is personally working for him, and in his interest. Though she has the privilege, if she wishes, to work for herself, circumstances should show that she had so elected.

Nothing in the evidence of Hermanns tends to show that his wife was to be paid for the services to be rendered in her own right. If he meant by "we" and "us" himself and his wife, as we suppose he did, then it was a joint service that was to be paid for, and the promise was to pay accordingly; and the husband would be entitled, and not the wife in her own and separate right. Upon this evidence, if true, certainly if the wife were dead, the husband could recover in his own right; whereas, if what was due belonged to the wife as separate property, his absolute right to it would depend on "her having died without children." There would seem to be no doubt that the testimony of Hermanns did not tend to support any of the issues as made, and there was error in admitting it.

This exception embodies another ruling of the court adverse to the appellant, of which he complains, but as it was the exclusion of certain evidence intended to discredit Hermanns, an exclusion of all that Hermanns said as included in this exception renders that ruling wholly unimportant, and we need not consider it.

As to the second exception, it is only necessary to say that the defendant, being administrator, and a party to the suit, was clearly incompetent as a witness, under the express language of Evidence Acts of 1864 and 1868. The ruling of the court upon that question was clearly right.

Under the view we take of the case upon the first exception, it became entirely needless to consider the question raised as to the power of the court to amend the bill of exceptions after the same has been signed and filed. The amendment did not prejudice the plaintiff's case in any degree. Having suffered no injury by it, it is rendered immaterial, and we express no opinion upon it.

The record shows that the judgment in this case was not properly entered, and it is proper that we should notice it in the interest of correct practice, although it is not before us regularly for review. It is entered for the penalty of the bond; whereas, no bond was in suit. The twenty-first section of article 29 of the Code provides that in any suit against an administrator "the court shall enter up judgment against the defendant for the penalty of the bond or damages laid in the declaration, and costs of suit, if the court shall so direct, to be released upon the payment of the sum ascertained to be paid by the verdict," etc. If the bond is in suit, then the judgment is for the penalty of it; and if not, then for the damages laid in the declaration, to be released on payment of amount of the verdict.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

1. A trust cannot be upheld unless it be of such a nature that the cestui que trust are defined and capable of enforcing its execution by proceedings in a court of chancery.
2. A deed conveying property in trust "for the use of the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America, subject to the discipline, usage and ministerial appointments of said Church," is too vague and indefinite, and the trust cannot be upheld.

(Decided November 20, 1885.)

APPPEAL from a decree in equity of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, in favor of complainants. Appeal dismissed.

Bill to subject certain real estate, with the church building thereon, to an equitable lien for moneys used in the erection of the building. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Yellott, Miller, Irving and Ritchie, JJ.

Messrs. Orville Horwitz and S. Parker Bosley, for appellants.

Messrs. William S. Bryan, Jr., and Arthur W. Machen, for appellees.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion to dismiss this appeal must prevail.

The decree appealed from provides for the sale of the lot of ground in controversy with the improvements upon it, consisting of a church building, in order to pay certain claims of the complainant and others, which the court below held to be an equitable lien thereon. The appellants, seven in number, calling themselves the "Trustees of the Towson Station of the Methodist Episcopal Church," were not made parties to the bill, but came in by petition, after the testimony had been taken but before the case was heard, praying to be made parties defendants, with leave to answer the bill; and this prayer was granted by the court upon certain conditions expressed in its order making them defendants. In their petition and answer the appellants claim that as trustees as aforesaid they are the holders of the legal title and the real owners of the property in dispute; and the appeal is taken by them as such trustees.

It appears from the record that Mary Ann Shealey, the then owner of the lot in question, for the consideration of $1,000, conveyed the same, by deed dated the 24th of February, 1870, to five named individuals "to have and to hold the same unto the said grantees, in trust that the said premises shall be used, kept, maintained and disposed of as a place of divine worship, for the use of the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America, subject to the discipline, usage and ministerial appointments of said Church, as from time to time authorized and declared by the General Conference of said Church, and the Annual Conference, in whose bounds said premises are situate."

On the 14th of October, 1870, an attempt was made to incorporate a religious society under the general law upon that subject, by the corporate name of "The Trustees of Towson Station of the Methodist Episcopal Church;" and on the same day the grantees in the deed of the 24th of February, 1870, conveyed the property in fee to this corporation by its corporate name. But the validity of this attempted incorporation came before this court in the case of Boyce v. Trustees, etc. of the M. E. Church, 46 Md. 359; and it was there held to be inoperative, because essential requirements of the corporation law had not been complied with. The result was that no title passed to this pretended corporation by the deed of the 14th of October, 1870, and this the appellants concede. They indeed admit and aver in their answer that there was no good or effective grant of the property to this corporation, but they insist that the property had in fact vested in the Methodist Episcopal Church of Towson Station, under the original deed of the 24th of February, 1870; and that they now represent that Church, as the duly elected trustees to succeed those named in that deed; and it is upon this ground alone that they claim the right to intervene in this case and appeal from the decree.

But we are unable to give to that deed any such construction or effect as will support this claim. It is not pretended that the grantees in that deed were the trustees of any incorporated religious society. The grant is to them as individuals, and the habendum is in the same terms, and not in either case to them and their successors in office, to be appointed by any religious society then or thereafter to be incorporated.

There are no words to be found in these parts of the deed which can have the effect to pass the title to such successors. Nor is there anything in the trust clause which can possibly have that effect. The appellants are not named in it as cestuis que trust, nor is it the effect of that clause to make them such. The purpose of that clause was to prevent the property from being used for secular purposes, or by any other Christian sect or denomination than the one described by general terms therein. The cestuis que trust or beneficiaries, if any, are not the appellants, but the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, who are or shall be subject to the discipline, usage and ministerial appointments of that Church, of voluntary ecclesiastical organization, as such discipline, usage and appointments may from time to time be authorized and declared by the General Conference of that Church, and by the Annual Conference, in whose bounds the property is situated.

But this designation of beneficiaries is too vague and indefinite to be sustained by the courts. According to the uniform course of decisions in this State, a trust cannot be upheld unless it be of such a nature that the cestuis que trust are defined, and capable of enforcing its execution by proceedings in a court of chancery. Church Extension of M. E. Church v. Smith, 56 Md. 397.

It is not necessary to cite the numerous cases in which this doctrine has been applied, for we hold it to be quite clear that when applied in this case the trust contained in this deed must fail.

It was no doubt the purpose of the parties who engaged in the commendable work of purchasing this lot and erecting a church thereon, to have the title thereto held by these grantees temporarily until a corporation could be formed under the law, capable of legally taking and holding the property, and that then these grantees should convey the same to such corporation. As we have shown, this was attempted; but the attempt, unfortunately, failed; and we are constrained to hold that under the original deed to these grantees, the appellants have no such interest, legal or equitable, in the property as would entitle them to intervene in this litigation and appeal from the decree which the court below has passed.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of State of New York, Repts.,
v.

Henry W. JAEHNE Appt.

1. The crime of bribery committed by a member of the Common Council of the City of New York is punishable under section 72 of the Penal Code, providing for imprisonment for not more than ten years, etc.; that section having superseded section 58 of the New York City Consolidation Act (Laws of 1882, chap. 410), providing for imprisonment not exceeding two years, etc.
2. By section 2143 of the Consolidation Act, the Penal Code (although enacted before the Consolidation Act) is to have the same effect upon that Act as if it had been passed after it. This provision does not transcend the legislative power; and it subordinates the Consolidation Act to the Penal Code wherever the two are in conflict.
3. The general Bribery Act embodied in the Penal Code covers the whole subject of bribery; and was intended to furnish the only rule governing the crime and punishment of bribery.
4. Section 72 of the Penal Code, being a later statute covering the same subject matter as section 58 of the Consolidation Act, and embracing new provisions, operated to repeal the prior Act, although the two are not in express terms repugnant.
5. Section 725 of the Penal Code, providing that that Code shall not affect "Acts incorporating municipal corporations, or Acts amending Acts of incorporation, or charters of such corporations," is to be construed as saving only those penal provisions of charter Acts which are not covered by the provisions of the Penal Code.
(Rapallo and Earle, JJ., dissenting.)
6. When, in addition to the confession of the party on trial for a crime, there is proof of circumstances which, although they may have an innocent construction, are nevertheless calculated to suggest the commission of crime, and for the explanation of which the confession furnishes the key, the case cannot be taken from the jury for a non-compliance with the requirement of section 395 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that the confession of a defendant "is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed."
7. It seems that, under said section 395 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the confession of the defendant is to be treated as competent proof of the corpus delicti, although insufficient, without corroboration, to warrant a conviction.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for the City and County of New York, convicting defendant of the crime of bribery. Affirmed.

In the year 1884 the defendant was a member of the board of aldermen of the City of New York and, as such, a member of the common council of that city. The indictment charged in substance: that in August of that year there was pending before the board of aldermen an application or petition of a corporation known as the Broadway Surface Railroad for the consent of the board, as provided by chapter 252 of the Laws of 1884, to construct and operate a railroad on Broadway in the City of New York; and that, at the time aforesaid, the defendant agreed with some person, to the grand jury unknown, to receive for his vote and influence in favor of said petition the sum of $20,000.

The indictment was in two counts, and on the trial it was assumed that one count was framed under section 72 of the Penal Code and the other under section 58 of the New York City Consolidation Act (Laws 1882, chap. 410); and the district attorney, being required to elect upon which count he would proceed, stated that he elected to go to trial on the first count, under section 72 of the Penal Code.

The defendant was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of nine years and ten months. The questions presented and the statutes relating thereto are set forth in the opinions.

Messrs. Roger A. Pryor and Richard S. Newcombe, for appellant:

I. The contention is that the crime of bribery, committed by a member of the common council of the City of New York, is punishable by the Consolidation Act, and not by the Penal Code.

The Penal Code was passed July 26, 1881. The Consolidation Act July 1, 1882.

The Penal Code expressly provides that the Consolidation Act shall be deemed to have been enacted after the Code (as was the fact) and shall be unaffected by the Code. This being so, it results that the Consolidation Act, as the later statute, supersedes the Penal Code, in so far as the two statutes are inconsistent.

The Consolidation Act makes special provision for the crime of bribery by a member of the common council of the City of New York (§ 58), and defines the crime in different terms, and imposes a different penalty from that announced in section 72 of the Penal Code. Being of repugnant provisions, the two Acts cannot stand together; and upon a familiar principle, the former, the Penal Code, is superseded by the latter, the Consolidation Act.

But by section 2143 of the Consolidation Act "The Penal Code is to have the same effect as if it was passed after this Act." Thus the Penal Code prescribes that the Consolidation Act shall be deemed the later law; while the Consolidation Act provides that the Penal Code shall be deemed the subsequent statute.

If, in this conflict of provision, we accept the prescription in the last enacted statute, i. e., the Consolidation Act, as the operative and obligatory mandate, then the Penal Code is the later law; and that law requires that the Consolidation Act shall "have the same effect as if enacted after this Code;" and so again we are conducted to the conclusion that the Penal Code is superseded by the Consolidation Act.

The two Acts are not inconsistent, for one is special and local and the other general. A posterior general Act does not repeal a prior local or special Act, unless the legislative intent to repeal be unequivocally apparent.

People v. Quigg, 59 N. Y. 83; Matter of Del. & Hud. Canal Co. 69 N. Y. 209; Gloversville v. Howell, 70 N. Y. 287; Matter of The Evergreens, 47 N. Y. 216; Matter of Goddard, 94 N. Y. 544. Again, the Consolidation Act is excepted from the operation of the Penal Code in express words, by section 725.

It is argued that section 725 applied only to statutes then existing and that the Consolidation Act was an after amendment. There are two objections to this: 1, it would involve the conclusion that the Consolidation Act supercedes the Code; 2, when the Penal Code was passed, the New York charter of 1873 was in force and it contained the identical provision against bribery found in the Consolidation Act.

In People v. N. Y. Catholic Prot. 38 Hun, 127, the court says: "By no construction can this provision of the Penal Code repeal the provisions of the Act of 1863, inserted in and made a part of the Consolidation Act of 1882; for one Act of the Legislature is not allowed to repeal another by implication when both can be maintained and enforced together, as these several statutory directions very clearly can be. Hankins v. Mayor, 64 N. Y. 18, 22. The provisions contained in the Consolidation Act are local and special; while that made by this subdivision of section 291 of the Penal Code is general; and it is a rule of construction that 'A special statute, providing for a particular case or applicable to a particular locality, is not repealed by a statute general in its terms and application, unless the intention of the Legislature to repeal or alter the special law is manifest, although the terms of the general Act would, if taken strictly and but for the special law, include the case provided for by it.' Van Denburg v. Greenbush, 66 N. Y. 1, 3, 4. Under this rule, also, the special provisions on this subject should still be maintained."

A later statute in the affirmative shall not take away a former Act; and eo potius if the former be particular and the latter general.

Gregory's Case, 3 Ooke, part 6, 19 b.

General legislation on a particular subject must give way to special legislation on the same subject.

State v. Mayor, 33 N. J. L. 61; State v. Brannin, 3 Zab. 484; People v. Quigg, 59 N. Y. 88.

When the Legislature passes a particular Act, and declares under what circumstances, in what manner and to what extent individuals shall be liable under that Act, the intentment is that they are liable under those provisions only, and do not fall within the provisions of former general Acts. Subsequent general Acts, although their language is sufficiently comprehensive for such purpose, will not control the provisions of prior special statutes unless the Legislature so intended.

Rochester v. Barnes, 26 Barb. 662; Dexter & Limerick Plank Road Co. v. Allen, 16 Barb. 15; Werner v. Bank, 2 Daly, 406; Perry v. Bank of Cent. N. Y. 15 How. Pr. 450; Commonwealth v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 375; Re Goddard, 16 Pick. 504; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 54, note 1.

If the Legislature manifests an unmistakable intent that the County of New York is an exception to the general law, that law does not apply.

Hankins v. Mayor, 64 N. Y. 21.

If the subsequent statute be not repugnant to a prior one, yet if the later one was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule that should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the original Act.

Sedg. Stat. & Const. Law, 124.

If the provisions of a special charter or a special authority, derived from the Legislature, can reasonably well consist with general legislation whose words are not absolutely inharmonious with it, the two are to be deemed to stand together; one as the general law of the land, the other as the law of the particular case.

State v. Stoll, 17 Wall. 425 (84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 650); Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 504; (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1012).

Again, section 726 is a clause of repeal; and since a repeal is possible only of a statute then in existence, and since the Consolidation Act was not in existence when the Penal Code was passed, it follows necessarily that the Consolidation Act is unaffected by section 726.

II. By section 395, Code Crim. Proc. the confession of the defendant is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed.

A confession is no evidence of the corpus delicti, but only of the connection of the defendant with the crime. The corpus delicti must be established by evidence independently of the confession.

State v. Guild, 5 Halst. 163; State v. Dubois, 54 Iowa, 363; May v. State, 92 Ill. 343; Pitts v. State, 43 Miss. 472; Gray v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 386; Priest v. State, 10 Neb. 393; U. S. v. Searcey, 26 Fed. Rep. 435; People v. Porter, 2 Park. 14; Hope's Case, 1 City H. Rec. 150; People v. Badgley, 16 Wend. 53; People v. McGloin, 91 N. Y. 242; Whart. Crim. Law, § 638; Bish. Crim. Law, § 1071; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 217.

Conceding, for argument, that the confession was competent evidence of the corpus delicti, still the additional evidence is insufficient to warrant the conviction. The corroborative evidence must go to prove the entire crime, and not only one or more of its constituent elements; and proof of one element is no proof of another.

People v. Plath, 100 N. Y. 590; S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 772.

"There must be some fact deposed to, independently altogether of the evidence of the accomplice, which, taken by itself, leads to the inference not only that a crime has been committed, but that the prisoner is implicated in it."

People v. Plath, 100 N. Y. 598; S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 772.

Such evidence as merely raises a suspicion of guilt is insufficient to satisfy the requirement of section 899; the evidence must carry conviction to the minds of the jury.

People v. Williams, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 844.

The corroboration of any witness needing support ought to be by some fact, the truth or falsehood of which goes to prove or disprove the offense charged.

Frazer v. People, 54 Barb. 810.

The additional evidence here, if any, being purely presumptive, it is important to bear in mind the principles by which the probative force of circumstantial evidence is determined and measured.

People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 145.

All proof must begin at a fixed point. The law never admits of an inference from an inference. Two imperfect things cannot make one perfect. The circumstance itself, from which the inference is to be drawn, is never to be presumed but must be substantially proved; for who can prove one doubtful thing by another?

Phillips, Theory of Presumptive Proof; Lawson, Presumptions, 569.

To take presumptions, in order to swell an equivocal and ambiguous fact into a criminal fact, is an entire misapprehension of the doctrine of presumptions.

Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Consist. 105.

In determining a question of fact from circumstantial evidence, there are two general rules to be observed; first, the hypothesis of guilt should flow naturally from the facts proved, and be consistent with them all; second, the evidence must be such as to exclude, to a moral certainty, every hypothesis but that of the prisoner's guilt of the offense imputed to him; or, in other words, the facts proved must be consistent with and point to his guilt not only, but they must be inconsistent with his innocence.

People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. 187; People v. Stokes, 2 N. Y. Crim. R. 332.

If the facts be consistent with innocence, they are not proof of guilt.

Ormsby v. People, 53 N. Y. 475; People v. Courtney, 23 Hun, 598; Frazer v. People, 54 Barb. 809; Commonwealth v. Holmes, 127 Mass. 424.

Conduct being susceptible of two opposite explanations, we are bound to assume it to be moral rather than immoral.

Port v. Port, 70 Ill. 484; Mason v. State, 32 Ark. 239; Carroll's Admr. v. Quynn, 13 Md. 379.

Where the facts of the case are consistent with honesty and dishonesty, a judicial tribunal will adopt the construction in favor of innocence.

Greenwood v. Lowe, 7 La. Ann. 197.

If a fair construction of the acts and declarations of an individual do not convict him of an offense, if the facts may all be admitted as proved, and the accused be innocent, he should not be presumed guilty. He may be guilty, but he may be innocent.

U. S. v. The Brig Burdett, 9 Pet. 682 (84 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 278). See also Frazer v. People, 54 Barb. 806.

When a specific intent is required to make an act an offense, the doing of the act does not raise a presumption that the act was done with that intent.

Lawson, Presumptions, 271; People v. Plath, 100 N. Y. 590; S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 772.

III. The court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony of Inspector Byrnes, in proof of the confession of defendant; or, if the motion were too late, in admitting the evidence of Rogers.

A confession, obtained either by threats or promises from anyone having authority over the accused or concerned in the administration of justice, is uniformly held to be inadmissible.

People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 386; Rev. v. Moore, 5 Cox, C. C. 555; 1 Phill. Ev. 461.

Confessions under the influence of threats of arrest for the crime accused, or to an officer upon promises of escape are inadmissible.

People v. Ah How, 84 Cal. 218.

A confession to a magistrate before examination, on his saying "It would be better for the accused to make a full confession," held, inadmissible.

People v. Ward, 15 Wend. 281; Commonwealth v. Nott, 29 Alb. Law. J. 97; S. C. 135 Mass. 269; State v. York, 37 N. H. 175; Rev. v. Partridge, 7 Carr. & P. 551; Rev. v. Shepherd, 7 Carr. & P. 579; Reg. v. Coley, 10 Cox, C. C. 536; Rev. v. Kingston, 4 Carr. & P. 387.

Independently of the strict rule of law invalidating a confession, it is a grave question whether the courts will sanction the device by which the inspector of police entrapped the defendant. The maxim is Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare; and it was not within the competency of the court, with all its power, to compel the defendant to an implicative admission.

N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 6.

Messrs. Randolph B. Martine, Dist. Atty. and De Lancey Nicoll, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondents:

I. The Penal Code was passed July 26, 1881. By section 727 it was to take effect on the first day of May, 1882; and it was further provided in the same section that "When construed in connection with other statutes it must be deemed to have been enacted on the 4th day of January, 1881, so that any statute enacted after that day is to have the same effect as if it had been enacted after this Code." By an amendment, chap. 102, Laws 1882, passed April 28, 1882, the date of its taking effect was postponed to December 1, 1882.

The New York City Consolidation Act, chap. 410, Laws 1882, was passed July 1, 1882. It was not a new body of law. Its title describes it as "An Act to consolidate into one Act, and to declare the special and local laws affecting public interests in the City of New York." By section 2148, it was provided that it should take effect on the first day of March, 1883.

In 1883, section 2148 was amended (chap. 276 Laws 1883); but the original and amended sections contained this provision: "For the purpose of determining the effect of this Act upon other Acts, except the Penal Code," and the effect of other Acts, except the Penal Code upon this Act—"this Act is deemed to have been enacted on the first day of January, 1882; all Acts passed after such date, and the Penal Code, are to have the same effect as if they were passed after this Act."

The Legislature thereby plainly declared that the Penal Code, in respect to the Consolidation Act, should be a subsequent Act.

The rule that a local statute is not repealed by a later general statute, even though the general law contains a general repealing clause as to inconsistent legislation, is subject to the qualification that where there is a manifest intent to repeal the former local statute, derivable either from the provisions of the general law, or from the fact that the two Acts are so repugnant and inconsistent that they cannot be reconciled, the later statute prevails.

Potter, Dwarr. Stat. 155; Heckmann v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 211.

And even though the later statute is not entirely repugnant to a prior one, if it was intended to furnish the only rule in the case, the prior statute is repealed.

Heckmann v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 211.

It was the purpose of the Code to provide the only rule for the punishment of the same offense, in whatever part of the State committed. Secs. 2, 7, 11, 719.

Where a new statute covers the whole subject matter of an old one, and adds offenses and prescribes different penalties from those enumerated in the old law, it is, by necessary implication, a repeal of the former statute.

The intention of the Legislature to repeal the prior local statute is expressed in the Penal Code itself.

Sections 2, 7, 11, 719, 726.

The Consolidation Act, in express words, makes the Penal Code a later statute than the Consolidation Act. Section 72 of the Penal Code is a law subsequent to section 58 of the Consolidation Act.

II. The test of the admissibility of confessions, as defined in section 395 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, is whether they were made "under the influence of fear, produced by threats, or upon a stipulation of the district attorney that the defendant should not be prosecuted therefor."

All other confessions, however procured, are admissible.

People v. Wentz, 37 N. Y. 303; People v. Cor, 80 N. Y. 500; People v. McGloin, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 154; People v. McCallam, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 189; People v. Chacon, 2 Cent. Rep. 910; Bishop (1 Crim. Pro. and E. § 1058) says: "Confessions alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, are inadequate to establish the corpus delicti." To say that they are inadequate alone to establish the corpus delicti implies that they are some evidence of the corpus delicti. And to say in the language of the Code (§ 395) that they are not "sufficient to warrant conviction without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed," means that the confessions are some proof that the crime charged has been committed.

Section 395, Code Crim. Proc. as to proof by confessions was construed in the following well considered cases:

People v. Kelly, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 414; People v. Carr, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 578; People v. Mondon, 4 N. Y. Cr. R. 1.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question on this appeal is whether the crime of bribery, committed by a member of the common council of the City of New York, is punishable under the Penal Code, or only under the New York City Consolidation Act of 1882.

The materiality of the question presented lies in the fact that the defendant was indicted and convicted of bribery, as a member of the common council of the City of New York, under section 72 of the Penal Code, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of nine years and ten months, pursuant to the provisions of that section; whereas, if he was punishable under the Consolidation Act of 1882, the maximum punishment by imprisonment could not have exceeded two years in the penitentiary.

After a careful consideration we have reached the conclusion that section 58 of the Consolidation Act is superseded by section 72 of the Penal Code; and that the crime of bribery, committed by a member of the common council of the City of New York, is defined and made punishable by that section.

In determining this question it is to be assumed that the Penal Code was the later enactment, although in point of fact it was passed prior to the Consolidation Act. The Penal Code was passed July 26, 1881, and took effect December 1, 1882. The Consolidation Act was passed July 1, 1882, and took effect March 1, 1883. But section 2143 of the Consolidation Act expressly declares that "For the purpose of determining the effect of this Act upon other Acts, except the Penal Code, and the effect of other Acts, except the Penal Code, upon this Act, this Act is deemed to have been enacted on the first day of January in the year 1882; all Acts passed after such date, and the Penal Code, are to have the same effect as if passed after this Act."

By the express prescription of the Legislature, therefore, the Penal Code, although enacted before the Consolidation Act, is to have the same effect upon the Consolidation Act as if it had been passed after that Act.

This provision, although somewhat anomalous, does not, as we can perceive, transcend the legislative power. It subordinates the Consolidation Act to the Penal Code, wherever the two statutes are in conflict; and moreover, what is material to notice, the provision affords the plainest implication that in the sense of the Legislature there were, or might be penal provisions in the Consolidation Act in conflict with the Penal Code.

For the purpose of construction the Legislature has declared in what order of time the two statutes shall be deemed to have been enacted; and there being no question of legislative power, it is the plain duty of courts to construe the two statutes in accordance with this direction.

Section 58 of the Consolidation Act is a re-enactment of section 100 of the Charter of 1873, which in turn was a re-enactment of section 114 of the Charter of 1870.

It is sufficiently specific for our present purpose to state that the section makes it a felony for any person to give or promise to any member of the common council or any municipal officer, any money or valuable thing with intent to influence his official action; or for any such officer to accept any such gift or promise, under any agreement or undertaking that his vote, opinion, judgment or action shall be influenced thereby; and subjects the bribe giver, upon conviction, to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years, or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, in the discretion of the court; and the bribe taker, on like conviction, to the same punishment by fine or imprisonment or both; and in addition subjects him to a forfeiture of his office; and disqualifies him from holding any office under the City of New York.

Section 72 of the Penal Code is in the following language: "§ 72. A judicial officer, a person who executes any of the functions of a public office not designated in titles 6 and 7 of this Code, or a person employed by or acting for the State or for any public officer in the business of the State, who asks, receives or agrees to receive a bribe or any money, property or value of any kind, or any promise or agreement therefor, upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, judgment, action, decision or other official proceeding shall be influenced thereby, or that he will do or omit any act or proceeding, or in any way neglect or violate any official duty, is punishable by imprisonment for not more than ten years, or by fine of not more than $5,000, or both. A conviction also forfeits any office held by the offender, and forever disqualifies him from holding any public office under the State."

It is material at the outset to inquire whether the offense of bribery committed by municipal officers is, as a general rule, embraced within and punishable under this section of the Penal Code.

If the section does not apply to the bribery of a municipal officer in any case, then plainly there is an end of the argument in support of this conviction. If, on the other hand, the section applies in general to this class of officers, then it becomes necessary, in order to reverse the conviction, that it should be found that the special case of bribery committed by municipal officers in the City of New York is excepted, or in some way taken out of the operation of this section.

The comprehensive character of the provisions of the Penal Code relating to bribery, both in respect to the definition of the offense and the officers by whom it may be committed, is apparent upon the most cursory reading. They form to a great extent the subject of three titles. Title 6 relates to crimes against the executive power of the State, and prescribes the punishment for giving or offering bribes, or for the asking or receiving of bribes by executive and administrative officers. Title 7 relates to crimes against the legislative power of the State, and contains provisions for the punishment of bribery of members of the Legislature. Title 8 is entitled "Of Crimes Against Public Justice."

N. Y.

Section 71 prescribes the offense of giving or offering a bribe to a judicial officer and certain other persons enumerated, either connected with the administration of justice, or who exercise quasi judicial functions.

Section 72, which prescribes the offense of receiving bribes, is not thus limited. It specifies judicial officers, but the specification is followed by words of the most comprehensive meaning, intended apparently to include in this final provision, all public officers within the State, of whatever character or grade, not included within the previous titles. It in terms not only embraces a judicial officer, but also "a person who executes any of the functions of a public office," not designated in titles 6 and 7.

That it was not the intention to confine the section to judicial officers is manifest also from the subsequent designation in the same section of "a person employed by or acting for the State or for any public officer in the business of the State;" and also from section 78, which supplements section 72 and prescribes the offense of giving or offering a bribe to "a person executing the functions of a public office," although the bribery of a judicial officer is specially provided for by section 71.

It is plain that a member of a common council or other municipal officer is a person "who executes the functions of a public office;" and we cannot doubt that municipal officers are within the purview of section 72. If this was less plain on the language of the section itself, there are cogent reasons for giving it this construction in view of the antecedent legislation and the presumed intention of the Legislature.

A reference to the successive statutes on the subject of bribery, commencing with the statute, chapter 181 of the Laws of 1806, re-enacted by the Revised Laws of 1873, shows a constant tendency on the part of the Legislature to extend the statutes against bribery to persons not embraced in previous laws. The Statute of 1806 included only state officers and members of the Senate and Assembly. The Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 760) enlarged the enumeration of state officers in the previous statutes, and for the first time included judicial officers.

The amendment of 1853 (chap. 539) still further extended the enumeration to any member of the common council or corporation of any city in the State, or to the mayor, recorder, chamberlain, treasurer or comptroller of such city, or any department of the government thereof.

The Act of 1869 (chap. 742) departed from the practice of special enumeration adopted in the previous statutes, and substituted words of general description: "Any person holding office under the laws of this State," and the law of 1869 was in force until the enactment of the Penal Code.

It will be noticed that members of a common council were specially included in the Act of 1853; and there can be no reason to suppose that when, in 1869, the Legislature substituted a general and comprehensive description in place of a specific enumeration, it intended to exempt municipal officers from the operation of the Statute of Bribery.

It would seem, moreover, that there could be no general policy upon which an omission of municipal affairs from the provisions of the general statute against bribery, could proceed. The cities of the State embrace a large share of its population and wealth. Municipal governments exercise by delegation, within a limited sphere and under certain restrictions, sovereign power. They create debts binding upon the municipality, and wield the power of taxation. The danger to which public rights and private property are exposed, from dishonest municipal administration, is certainly as great as from corruption on the bench or in the Legislature.

It is inconceivable that a Bribery Statute of general application should be enacted, which did not embrace bribery of municipal officers. We find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that section 72 of the Penal Code applies in general to the offense of bribery committed by municipal officers.

We are therefore brought directly to the main question, whether section 58 of the Consolidation Act is in force and takes the case of bribery, when committed by a member of the common council of the City of New York, out of the operation of section 72 of the Penal Code, thereby requiring a different procedure and a different punishment, in the special case, from that prescribed by the general law governing the same offense when committed by a member of a common council in other cities of the State.

The Penal Code, as its title implies, is an institute of criminal justice, of general application; and was enacted in harmony with the tendency of recent legislation, for the purpose of embodying in a single statute the system of criminal law applicable to the State, and substituting the statute so enacted in place of the great number of statutes and amendments of statutes which together, before the enactment of the Code, constituted the body of the criminal law.

In the seventh section it is declared that "This Code specifies the classes of persons who are deemed capable of crimes and liable to punishment; the nature of the various crimes; and prescribes the kind and measure of punishment to be inflicted for each;" and it is declared in the second section that "No act or omission begun after the beginning of the day on which the Code takes effect as a law shall be deemed criminal and punishable, except as prescribed or authorized by the Code, or by some statute of this State not repealed by it."

It is a plain inference from these provisions that the Penal Code was intended as a revision of the prior laws in respect to crimes and their punishment, and as a substitute for the scattered and fragmentary legislation which preceded it.

The Penal Code contains no general clause repealing prior statutes covering the subjects embraced in its provisions. It, however, defines and prescribes the punishment for murder, larceny, burglary and all the generally recognized offenses; and it cannot be doubted that its provisions on these subjects were intended as a substitute for similar provisions in the prior laws.

On comparing the offense of bribery, as defined by the Consolidation Act and by section 72 of the Penal Code, it will be found that all the elements of the crime, as defined in the Consolidation Act, are included in the definition of the same crime in the Penal Code, although the definitions in the two statutes are not identical in language. By the Consolidation Act every officer enumerated therein, "who shall accept a gift or promise," etc., with the agreement or understanding that his vote or action shall be influenced thereby, is declared guilty of a felony. By section 72 of the Penal Code, the words "receives or agrees to receive a bribe," etc., are used in place of those in the Consolidation Act. But the words in both statutes are of equivalent meaning.

It was assumed on the trial that the indictment was found under the provision of the Penal Code. In point of form we think the indictment was good under either statute. It is not necessary that an indictment should follow the precise language of a statute, but words of equivalent import are sufficient; and this rule of the common law is now declared by statute. Code, Crim. Proc. § 283.

We have then first, a special provision in the charter of the City of New York, making bribery committed by a city officer a crime, and declaring its punishment; and next, a general law later in date (for so it must be deemed), containing provisions defining with great minuteness the crime of bribery by executive, legislative and judicial officers; and in the final section including every "person executing the functions of a public office."

The learned counsel for the defendant insists that the two Acts are not necessarily repugnant, and they invoke the application to this case of the general rule in respect to the repeal of statutes by implication, that a posterior general Act does not repeal a prior local Act, unless the legislative intent to repeal be unequivocally apparent.

Whether a subsequent statute repeals a prior one, in the absence of express words, depends upon the intention of the Legislature; and one of the tests frequently resorted to to ascertain whether there is a repeal by implication is to inquire whether the special and general Acts may both be executed without involving repugnancy of rights or remedies. In some cases the question has been solved by holding that the general Act was intended to declare a general rule governing cases not already provided for; and that a prior special statute on the same subject, operating upon a single person or class of persons or within a limited territory, should be treated as if specially excepted from the operation of the general law.

It will be found I think, on examining the cases in which the courts have held that a special law was not repealed by a subsequent general law on the same subject, that they are as a general rule cases where the Legislature was not dealing directly with the subject of the prior law; and it was not in the mind of the Legislature when the general law was enacted; or where the special law was part of a system of local administration, or where it was possible to assign a reasonable motive for retaining the special and peculiar provisions of the special Act, notwithstanding the enactment of a subsequent general rule covering the same subject.

The General Bribery Act not only covers the whole subject, but was we think plainly intended to furnish the only rule governing the crime and punishment of bribery. It includes by enumeration and description all officials of every grade, town, city, county and state officers; provides a uniform punishment, but gives to the court a discretion in applying it within the limit described, to meet the circumstances of the particular case.

The crime of bribery is not local, affecting only a particular locality. No matter in what place the crime is committed, or whether by a town, city, county or state officer, it is an offense, in the punishment of which the whole public is interested. It is peculiarly a crime against society at large. It impairs public confidence in the integrity of official administration; a confidence most necessary to be maintained.

It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature, when it enacted the Penal Code, intended to exempt officials in the City of New York from the operation of the bribery sections. No public policy can be assigned for such a discrimination; and we think the case is within the rule that "A later statute covering the same subject matter and embracing new provisions operates to repeal the prior Act, although the two Acts are not in express terms repugnant." See Norris v. Crocker, 18 How. 429 [54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 210]; Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 545; U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88 [78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 158]; Heckmann v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 215; People v. Gold & Stock Tel. Co. 98 N. Y. 78.

The construction we have given to the Penal Code in connection with the Consolidation Act is generally strengthened in view of the inconsistencies which would result from holding that section 58 of the Consolidation Act is still in force.

At the time of the enactment of the Penal Code, the charters of the Cities of New York, Brooklyn and Long Island City, contained provisions for punishing bribery committed by municipal officers in those cities. Laws 1873, chap. 535, § 100; Id. chap. 863, tit. 19, § 22; Laws of 1871, chap. 760.

But no such provisions were contained in the charters of Albany, Poughkeepsie, Troy, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo or Elmira. The General Bribery Act of 1869, which was in force until the enactment of the Penal Code, made bribery a crime when committed by "any person holding office under the laws of this State."

The Statute of 1869 was unquestionably superseded by the provisions of the Penal Code. Unless, therefore, municipal officers are punishable for bribery under section 72, it follows that bribery committed by municipal officers in New York, Brooklyn and Long Island City is punishable under the special provisions of the charters of these cities; but is not an offense and is not punishable when committed by officers of the same class in the other cities of the State.

If, on the other hand, section 72, as we have endeavored to show, includes municipal officers, the contention that nevertheless the crime and punishment of bribery by municipal officers in the City of New York is still governed by section 58 of the Consolidation Act, leads to an equally absurd result; it involves the necessity of ascribing to the Legislature an intention to discriminate in the punishment of bribery when committed by a municipal officer in the City of

New York, and when committed by municipal officers in other cities; and also the further intention to punish the crime when committed in the smaller municipalities, with far greater severity than when committed by municipal officers of the most populous and important city of the Union.

Such legislation is absurd in theory, and leads to injustice. It regulates punishment according to the locality of the crime, instead of by the nature of the offense. It is repugnant to the principle that laws should be equal and impartial, and ignores a natural sentiment which requires even-handed justice, even in the punishment of crimes. A law punishing homicide in the City of New York by imprisonment in the state prison, and in Brooklyn by hanging, would shock the general sense; but it would not be different in principle from a law punishing bribery in one city by imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years, and in the other by imprisonment in the state prison for ten years.

It is the duty of courts, in construing statutes, to avoid if possible a construction which leads to absurdity or manifest injustice; and the case before us calls for the application of this principle. The fact that prior to the Penal Code the same inconsistency existed between the punishment for bribery under the charter provisions and the General Bribery Statute does not, we think, make it less the duty of the court to seek to place such a construction upon the Penal Code as will remedy such an anomalous and unsatisfactory condition of the law.

The argument so far has proceeded upon the assumption that the Penal Code contains no express provision saving the bribery provision in the Consolidation Act from its operation. But it is claimed by the counsel for the defendant that section 58 of the Consolidation Act is continued in force by section 725 of the Penal Code.

That section is as follows:

"§ 725. Nothing in this Code affects any of the provisions of the following statutes; but such statutes are recognized as continuing in force, notwithstanding the provisions of this Code, except so far as they have been repealed by subsequent laws:

1. All Acts incorporating municipal corporations, and Acts amending Acts of incorporation, or charters of such corporation, or providing for the election or appointment of officers therein, or defining the powers and duties of such officers.

2. All Acts relating to emigrants or other passengers in vessels coming from foreign countries, except as provided in section 626 of this Code.

3. All Acts for the punishment of intoxication or the suppression of intemperance, or regulating the rule or disposition of intoxicating or spirituous liquors.

4. All Acts defining and providing for the punishment of offenses not defined and made punishable by this Code."

The claim is that this section excepts from the operation of the Penal Code all penal provisions in charter Acts; and that as section 58 of the Consolidation Act is a penal provision of that character, it is excepted from the operation of the Penal Code.

Notwithstanding the generality of the language of section 725, it is apparent from other provisions, both of the Consolidation Act and of the Penal Code, that it was not intended that all penal provisions in charter Acts should remain in force unaffected by the Penal Code. The provision in section 2143 of the Consolidation Act, that the Penal Code should have the same effect upon the Consolidation Act as if it was passed after that Act, has no signification except upon the assumption that in the sense of the Legislature the Penal Code contained provisions which, if deemed to have been enacted after the Consolidation Act, would or might modify the penal clauses in that Act.

Moreover, it was the evident intention of the Legislature to establish by the Penal Code a uniform rule of punishment for crimes of the same grade throughout the State. It is enacted in section 719 that an offense specified in the Code, committed after it has taken effect, "must be punished according to the provisions of this Code, and not otherwise."

The claim that section 725 was intended to apply to and preserve unimpaired all penal provisions in charter Acts is clearly disproved by section 726. That section, which contains the only express repealing provision in the Code, is as follows:

"§ 726. All Acts and parts of Acts which are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act are repealed, so far as they impose any punishment for crime, except as herein provided."

The true meaning of the phrase, "except as herein provided," would, I apprehend, have been more clearly expressed by the words, "other than as herein provided." The Consolidation Act does impose a punishment for bribery, inconsistent with that prescribed by the Penal Code; and section 726, if it goes no further, clearly conforms the punishment for bribery under the Consolidation Act to that prescribed by the Penal Code, and so to that extent affects the charter provision.

In this view it is not very material whether section 58 is regarded as wholly repealed, or only as modified in respect to the punishment. If modified only, the result would be that there are two statutes identical in substance, both as respects the definition of the crime and its punishment, under either of which an indictment would lie; a judgment under one barring proceedings under the other.

But we are of opinion that section 725 is to be construed as saving only those penal provisions of charter Acts which are not covered by the provisions of the Penal Code; and this limitation of the generality of the language of that section is required, upon construing it in connection with other provisions and in view of the general purpose of the Legislature in enacting the Penal Code, to consolidate into one Crimes Act the various statutes relating to crimes, and to prescribe a uniform rule of punishment.

The main evidence produced on the trial, to sustain the charge of bribery, was that of a police inspector and other police officers, who testified to confessions of the defendant. It did not appear that they were made under the influence of fear produced by threats, or upon any stipulation for immunity from prosecution, so as to make them inadmissible under section 895 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

But it is claimed that there was no proof in addition to the confessions, as required by statute, to warrant a conviction. By section 895 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is declared that the confession of a defendant "is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed."

There was evidence given on the trial, showing that the Broadway Railway Grant was passed under circumstances which, while they may possibly have been consistent with an innocent intention on the part of the defendant and others, nevertheless indicated the operation of unusual motives and influences; and when interpreted in the light of the confession are strongly corroborative of its truth.

It is insisted that, under the statute, the corpus delicti must be proved or evidence given tending to prove it wholly independent of the confession; and that no evidence was given which, disconnected from the confessions, had a legal tendency to prove the body of the crime. It would be a sufficient answer to this point that it is not raised by any exception on the trial, and it clearly was not raised by the exception to the denial of a motion for a new trial, made after verdict.

But we are of opinion that when, in addition to the confession, there is proof of circumstances which, although they may have an innocent construction, are nevertheless calculated to suggest the commission of crime, and for the explanation of which the confession furnishes the key, the case cannot be taken from the jury for a noncompliance with the requirement of the statute. The words of the statute, "additional proof that the crime charged has been committed," seem to imply that the confession is to be treated as evidence of the corpus delicti; that is, not only of the subjective criminal act, but also the criminal agency of the defendant; in other words, as competent proof of the body of the crime, although insufficient without corroboration to warrant a conviction.

"Full proof" said Nelson, Oh. J., in People v. Badgley, 16 Wend. 59 "of the body of the crime, the corpus delicti, independently of the confession, is not required by any of the cases; and in many of them slight corroborating facts were held sufficient."

We are of opinion that there was evidence in addition to the confession, which constituted "additional proof" within the statute.

We have examined the other questions raised, but we have reached the conclusion that no error is disclosed in the record, and that the judgment should be affirmed. The case was carefully tried. No evidence in favor of the defendant was excluded, and none admitted against him of doubtful competency. The charge was full and explicit upon all the points to which the attention of the court was directed.

We have been greatly aided in our examination of the case by the arguments of the respective counsel, from which nothing on either side was omitted, legitimately bearing upon the questions presented.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur, except Rapallo, J., who reads dissenting opinion for reversal and Earl, J., who concurs therein.

Rapallo, J., dissenting:

The important question in this case is whether the offense of which the prisoner was convicted was punishable under section 72 of the Penal Code or under section 58 of the Consolidation Act of 1882.

Section 72 of the Penal Code provides as follows:

"A judicial officer, a person who executes any of the functions of a public office not designated in titles 6 and 7 of the Code, or a person employed by or acting for the State or for any public officer in the business of the State, who asks, receives or agrees to receive a bribe, or any money, property or value of any kind, or any promise or agreement therefor, upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, judgment, action, decision or other official proceeding shall be influenced thereby, or that he will do or omit any act or proceeding, or in any way neglect or violate any official duty, is punishable by imprisonment for not more than ten years or by a fine of not more than $5,000 or both. A conviction also forfeits any office held by the offender and forever disqualifies him from holding any office under the State."

This Code was passed July 26, 1881, and section 727 declares: "This Act shall take effect on the first day of December, 1882. When construed in connection with other statutes it must be deemed to have been enacted on the 4th day of January, 1881, so that any statute enacted after that day is to have the same effect as if it had been enacted after this Code."

The Consolidation Act was passed July 1, 1882, and is entitled "An Act to Consolidate into One Act, and to Declare the Special and Local Laws Affecting Public Interests in the City of New York." It contains the charter of the corporation and provides for the local government of the city. It continues the board of aldermen and the various departments of the city government.

Section 58, so far as relates to the question now at issue is in the following words:

"§ 58. Every person who shall promise, offer, or give, or cause, or aid, or abet in causing to be promised, offered or given, or furnish or agree to furnish in whole or in part, to any other person, to be promised, offered or given to any member of the common council, or any officer of the corporation, or clerk, after his election or appointment as such officer, member, or clerk, or before or after he shall have qualified and taken his seat, or entered upon his duty, any moneys, goods, right in action, or other property, or anything of value, or any pecuniary advantage, present or prospective, with intent to influence his vote, opinion, judgment, or action, on any question, matter, cause or proceedings which may be then pending or may by law be at any time brought before him in his official or clerical capacity, shall be deemed guilty of a felony; and shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned in a penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years; or shall be fined not exceeding $5,000; or both, in the discretion of the court."

Every officer in this section enumerated who shall accept any such gift or promise, or undertaking to make the same under any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, judgment or action shall be influenced thereby, or shall be given in any question, matter, cause or proceeding then or at any time pending, or which may by law be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall, upon conviction, be disqualified from holding any public office, trust or appointment under the City of New York and shall forfeit his office, and shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding two years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000; or both, in the discretion of the court.

The prisoner was indicted for the crime of bribery committed by him in August, 1884, as a member of the common council of the City of New York. It was assumed upon the trial that one count of the indictment was framed under section 72 of the Penal Code, and the other under section 58 of the Consolidation Act. On the trial the court, on motion of the counsel for the prisoner, required the district attorney to elect upon which count of the indictment he would proceed, and thereupon the district attorney stated that he elected to go to trial on the first count, under section 72 of the Penal Code.

The counsel for the prisoner thereupon moved to dismiss the indictment or direct an acquittal, upon the ground that no conviction could be had under that count. The motion was denied and an exception taken, and the trial proceeded.

The jury rendered a verdict of guilty. A motion in arrest of judgment was made and denied; and the prisoner was then sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison at hard labor for the term of nine years and ten months.

It will be observed that the Penal Code is a general statute, operative throughout the State; and that section 72 provides for the punishment of the crime of bribery, committed by any person who executes any of the functions of a public office not designated in titles 6 and 7 of the Code (which relate to state officers); and fixes the maximum punishment at imprisonment in the state prison for ten years, and $5,000 fine, or both; while section 58 of the Consolidation Act is a local Act, applying only to the City of New York, and relates only to a special class of officers, viz.: members of the common council of said city, officers of the corporation and clerks; and fixes the maximum punishment for the crime committed by such officers at imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years and $5,000 fine, or both.

The Penal Code, as has been stated, was passed in July, 1881, and the Consolidation Act in July, 1882. The Consolidation Act provides for the punishment of the same crime for which the prisoner was indicted; he was one of the officers specially referred to in that Act, and it being the later statute in point of time, would unquestionably control where it differed from the Penal Code, and the present controversy would never have arisen but for a peculiar provision of the Consolidation Act, contained in section 2143 of that Act in the following language:

"For the purpose of determining the effect of this Act upon other Acts, except the Penal Code, and the effect of other Acts, except the Penal Code, upon this Act, this Act is deemed to have been enacted on the first day of January, 1882. All Acts passed after such date, and the Penal Code, are to have the same effect as if they were passed after this Act. This Act shall take effect on the first day of March, 1883."

The effect of this section is the question now before us. It is claimed on the part of the prosecution that the provisions of section 58 of the Consolidation Act are inconsistent with those of section 73 of the Penal Code; and that section 2148 (by declaring that the Penal Code, although in fact passed first, is to have the same effect as if passed last), operates to repeal section 58 of the Consolidation Act, and to put in its place section 73 of the Penal Code.

This argument puts the Legislature in the remarkable position of carefully framing and enacting the provisions of section 58, and in the same breath and by the same Act, declaring that they shall have no effect whatever, but shall be deemed repealed and superseded by an Act passed the previous year.

Such a self stultification cannot be attributed to the Legislature, if there is any rational theory upon which its enactment can be reconciled.

In the first place it should be assumed that in giving to the Penal Code the position of the later statute, the Legislature had in mind the familiar and firmly established rule for the construction of statutes, that general legislation on a particular subject must give way to special legislation on the same subject, and that laws special and local in their application are not deemed repealed or modified by general legislation on the same subject, although the terms of the general Act are broad enough to include the cases embraced in the special law, unless the intent to change the local law is clearly manifested. Matter of Comrs. of Central Park, 50 N. Y. 498; McKenna v. Edmundstone, 91 N. Y. 281; People v. Quigg, 59 N. Y. 88.

Whatever purpose the Legislature may have had in view therefore in the enactment of section 2148, it is clear that it could not have been intended to operate as a repeal of section 58; for they well knew that even if the Penal Code had in fact been passed after the Consolidation Act, it would not have affected the provisions of section 58, which are special and local in their application, being applicable only to members of the common council and other municipal officers of the City of New York; and that to repeal these provisions, special reference to them or some other manifestation of the intent to repeal them than merely giving to the Penal Code the position of a later statute was necessary. They were not therefore guilty of the absurdity of enacting section 58 and inserting in the same Act a provision which would prevent its operation.

But looking a little further into the subject, we find that at the time of the passage of the Penal Code there was and for many years had been in force a special local statute, for the punishment of bribery of members of the common council and other municipal officers of the City of New York, which differed materially from the general law on the subject of bribery; and that this special local statute was not only unaffected by the Code, but was retained in force by an express provision of the Code itself.

Prior to the adoption of the Penal Code the general provisions of law on the subject of bribery were contained in the Act of 1853, chap. 539, entitled "An Act to Amend the Existing Laws Relative to Bribery," and Laws of 1869, chapter 742, of the Act entitled "An Act for the More Effectual Suppression and Punishment of Bribery."

The Act of 1853 amended the Revised Statutes and enumerated the various officers who might commit the crime, including the Governor, state officers, members of the Legislature, judiciary, and also members of the common council or corporation of any city in this State; and imposed a maximum punishment on the offending officer of ten years' imprisonment and $5,000 fine, besides forfeiture of office and disqualification.

The Act of 1869 was more general in its terms. It did not enumerate the officers, but applied to "any person holding office under the laws of this State" who should receive or consent to receive a bribe. It imposed upon the party convicted a maximum punishment of five years' imprisonment in the state prison, and $5,000 fine. It omitted the punishment of forfeiture of office and disqualification from holding office, which was contained in the Revised Statutes and in the Act of 1853, and it contained this remarkable provision:

"§ 2. No person who has heretofore paid or offered, or shall hereafter pay or offer a bribe to any person holding office under the laws of this State, which has been or shall be accepted in whole or in part, shall be liable to criminal prosecution therefor."

This was the general law of the State on the subject of bribery when the Penal Code was adopted; but at the same time there were in force special and local statutes on that subject, applicable to members of the common council and other municipal officers of the City of New York and some of the other cities of the State, which differed from the general law.

The Act to amend the charter of the City of New York (Laws of 1853, chap. 217, § 14) contained a provision substantially in the same form as section 58 of the Consolidation Act, making the acceptance of a bribe or of a promise of a bribe by any member of the common council or officer of the corporation, a felony punishable by forfeiture of office and disqualification from holding office under the city, and by imprisonment in the state prison for ten years, or a fine of $5,000, or both; thus conforming to the general law of 1853 on the subject of bribery.

The charter of 1857 (Laws 1857, chap. 446), entitled "An Act to Amend the Charter of the City of New York," section 52, re-enacted the foregoing provision of the charter of 1853, but reduced the maximum punishment to two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary and $5,000 fine, besides being disqualified from holding any office under the City of New York.

This was the first enactment which imposed a punishment for bribery on a member of the common council of the City of New York different from that established by the general law.

This provision was re-enacted in the charter of 1870 (Laws 1870, chap. 137, § 114); and was again re-enacted in the charter of 1873 (Laws 1873, chap. 335, § 100) in the same language; and was in force at the time of the passage of the Penal Code.

Thus it will be seen that for nearly twenty-five years before the passage of the Penal Code, it had been the law, under the charters of the City of New York, that the maximum punishment which could be inflicted upon a member of the common council of that city for accepting a bribe was two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary and $5,000 fine, and a disqualification from holding any office or public trust under the city.

The general provision in the Penal Code for the punishment of bribery did not, under the general rule for the construction of statutes before adverted to, operate to repeal or alter this local provision contained in the charter, even if the Penal Code be treated as the last enactment. It would be assumed in conformity with that rule that the general law was not intended to affect the local law, unless the intention that it should affect it plainly appeared.

But so far from there being any appearance of such intention, the precise contrary is made manifest by section 725 of the Penal Code, which provides: "§ 725. Nothing in this Code affects any of the provisions of the following statutes; but such statutes are recognized as continuing in force notwithstanding the provisions of this Code, except so far as they have been repealed or affected by subsequent laws." Then follows an enumeration of the laws not affected by the Code, which enumeration includes "All Acts incorporating municipal corporations, and Acts amending Acts of incorporation or charters of such corporations."

In view of this plain provision of the Code, the Legislature may well have adopted section 2143 of the Consolidation Act, without deeming that by so doing they impaired any provision of the charter of the City of New York, which was embraced in the Consolidation Act. The Penal Code was before the Legislature when the Consolidation Act was passed, the Penal Code having been passed at a previous session. The difference between the punishment prescribed for bribery in that Code and in section 100 of the charter of 1873, and section 58 of the Consolidation Act, was plainly apparent; but at the same time it was provided that nothing in the Code should affect any of the provisions of any charter or Act amending the charter of a municipal corporation. It was obvious, in view of the saving clause, that had the Code been in fact passed after the Consolidation Act, it could have had no effect upon the provisions of section 58.

It is argued that it cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended to provide for the punishment of the crime of bribery in one class of officers by one measure of punishment, and that for precisely the same offense they should prescribe a different punishment for a different class of officers. It is indeed difficult to assign a reason for making the distinction, and especially for making the punishment for bribery comparatively so light in respect to members of the common council of the City of New York, when the magnitude of the interests controlled by that body is considered. But nevertheless the distinction has been made and has existed ever since 1857 in the City of New York, and also in several other cities of the State. By the charter of Long Island City (Laws 1871, chap. 471, title II, § 1), any city officer found guilty of bribery or corruption is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not less than three nor more than ten years, or a fine of $5,000, or both.

In this case it will be observed the provision is more severe than that of the general law, for it prescribes a minimum punishment of three years' imprisonment.

By the Act amending the charter of the City of Brooklyn (Laws 1873, chap. 863, title XIX, § 22) any member or officer of the common council or any city officer receiving a bribe is declared guilty of a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term of not less than three nor more than five years.

These provisions clearly were left in force by the Penal Code; and, after the passage of that Code, in the charter of the City of Albany, adopted in 1883 (Laws 1883, chap. 298, title XVIII, § 6), a provision was inserted that any member of the common council or other officer of the city who should accept a bribe or a promise of a bribe should be disqualified from holding office under the City of Albany and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both; which provision is almost identical with section 58 of the Consolidation Act. There is no ground upon which it can be pretended that the provisions of that Act are affected by the Penal Code which took effect December 1, 1882.

The contention therefore that it was the policy of the Legislature to provide a uniform punishment throughout the State, for the crime of bribery, is not sustained by reference to its Acts. It rather seems to have been the practice to pass local laws, operative in the several municipalities, providing for the punishment of the municipal officers when guilty of bribery.

Several ingenious arguments have been presented by the counsel for the People, for the purpose of avoiding the plain language of these statutes. It is urged that subdivision 1 of section 725 of the Penal Code, which declares that nothing in that Code affects any of the provisions of any Act incorporating a municipal corporation or amending the charter of such corporation, is qualified by subdivision 4 of section 725, which enumerates among the statutes not affected by the Code "All Acts defining and providing for the punishment of offenses not defined and made punishable by this Code."

We fail to perceive how this provision affects subdivision 1. It is an additional exception and covers all enactments, although not contained in any municipal charter, which provide for the punishment of particular offenses not provided for in the Code.

The usual general repealing clause in section 726, of all Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent with the provisions of the Code, is also referred to. But that clause in a general law is not sufficient to repeal a special local law not referred to in terms and which is capable of coexisting with the general law.

Whipple v. Christian, 80 N. Y. 523, 526; Matter of the Evergreens, 47 N. Y. 216 and other cases; Matter of Comrs. of Central Park, 50 N. Y. 493.

A provision affecting only a certain locality or a specified class of persons is not necessarily inconsistent with a general law, but is an exception to it. The discussion of that question is however unnecessary, when we find that the general law expressly ratifies and recognizes the exception.

The entire repealing section 726, reads as follows: § 726. All Acts and parts of Acts which are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act are repealed so far as they impose any punishment for crime, except as herein provided.

The words "so far as they impose any punishment for crime" are commented upon in support of the position that so much of the Consolidation Act as prescribes the punishment for bribery was intended to be embraced in the repeal. It is difficult to see how this could be when it is remembered that the Consolidation Act had not then been passed. But to meet that point it is sought to apply the language to the charter of 1878. This is equally impossible when we recall the provision of section 725, that nothing in the Code affects "any provision" of any charter Act of a municipal corporation; and the concluding sentence of section 726 settles the question, by declaring that inconsistent Acts imposing punishment for crime are repealed "except as herein provided," thus recognizing that some Acts inconsistent with the Code, imposing punishment for crime, are excepted from the repeal and are retained in force. The charter Acts referred to come within this category.

The further ground is taken that section 100 of the charter of 1878 and section 58 of the Consolidation Act stand upon the footing of a mere municipal ordinance created by the Legislature, and making that a crime against the corporation which, in some of its features, is also a crime against the State; and that consequently the general law against bribery is in full force, notwithstanding the special law relating to the City of New York.

This argument it is difficult to understand. If, under authority conferred by the Legislature, an ordinance had been passed by the corporation for the punishment of an offense, there would be force in the suggestion that if the same offense were punishable under the general laws of the State, they could be enforced and would not be superseded by the corporation ordinance. But the provision in question was not a corporation ordinance. It was a law of the State, enacted by the same authority as the Penal Code and, although affecting only particular local officers, had all the force (with respect to crimes committed by them) of a law of the State.

Our conclusion is that the judgment of the supreme court and of the court of over and terminer must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

1. A devise to one person, of all testator's real estate in possession, without words of inheritance, with a gift over in the event only of the devisee's dying without issue, shows an intention to vest the fee in the primary devisee.
2. Where real estate is devised in terms denoting an intention that the primary devisee shall take a fee on the death of testator, followed by a devise over in case of his death without issue, the words refer to death without issue in the life time of the testator; and the primary devisee surviving the testator takes an absolute estate in fee simple.

3. But this rule applies only where the context of the will is silent, and affords no indication of intention other than that disclosed by words of absolute gift, followed by a gift over in case of death or other specified event; and slight circumstances will vary their construction and give effect to the language according to its natural import.
4. Hence, where the primary devise was to testator's son, "subject to the proviso hereinafter contained," and the will subsequently provided that "on the death of my son without issue" the estate should go over to testator's grandchildren, and also "that in case my son should die before the provisions of this will becomes an act, the devisees last named (the grandchildren) shall perform and fulfill all the conditions required of my son to the legatees named in this my will" (referring to antecedent specific legacies which the will provided should be paid by the son within two years after testator's death), the intention of the testator appears to have been that the gift over should take effect upon the death of his son without issue, at any time, either before or after his own death.
5. The fact that a devisee of real estate is personally charged with the payment of legacies is not decisive that the primary devise was in fee, when a different intention is disclosed.

(Decided October 5, 1896.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Albany Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action for partition. Affirmed.

The case turns upon the construction of a will, the terms of which are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. Nathaniel C. Moak, with Mr. Andrew Vanderzee, for appellants:

I. The will of Harmon Vanderzee is made upon the theory and basis that the testator had no personal property. In this respect it is unlike the will in Nellis v. Nellis, 1 Cent. Rep. 296, where all the testator's personal property was bequeathed to the devisees of the land.

The second clause devises the real estate, not a mere life estate, absolutely to testator's son Cornelius, "subject to the proviso hereinafter contained."

Roseboom v. Roseboom, 15 Hun, 309.

Since the Revised Statutes, this gives the fee without adding the word "heira."

1 R. S. 748, § 1; 1 Edm. Stat. 699; Roseboom v. Roseboom, 15 Hun, 314; Bishop v. Bishop, 4 Hill, 138; Kelly v. Kelly, 5 Lans. 443; affd. 61 N. Y. 47; Kirk v. Richardson, 32 Hun, 434.

Testator gives the devisee the lands, and not any particular estate in them. No remainder, after a life estate, is given to the children or issue of the devisee; and had he had issue, such issue would have taken no estate in the lands.

Post v. Hoyer, 33 N. Y. 593.

If the devisee should die in the life time of the testator, leaving issue, the devise would by operation of law take effect in favor of such issue; and they would take in consequence of the devise to their father, and not because any estate was devised to them.

2 R. S. 66, § 52; 2 Edm. Stat. 66.

II. The tenth clause, providing for Cornelius' dying without issue, refers to his so dying during the lifetime of the testator only. The clause is one of contingency and not of limitation.

Kelly v. Kelly, 5 Lans. 443-449; affd. 61 N. Y. 47, 50, 51; McLoughlin v. Maher, 17 Hun, 215; Gibson v. Walker, 20 N. Y. 476, 488; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 124; *Embury v. None of the cases cited by respondents conflict with the appellants' contention. They are all cases where there were provisions in the will clearly showing that the contingency of death spoken of was a death after that of the testator.

III. Acceptance of the devise imposed upon the devisee a personal liability and duty to pay the legacies given by the testator, without reference to the question whether or not the property devised and accepted was sufficient for that purpose.

Gridley v. Gridley, 24 N. Y. 180, reversing S. C. 33 Barb. 250; Harris v. Am. Bible Society, 4 Trans. App. 488, 489.

The devise having imposed upon the devisee, and he having accepted therewith a personal liability to pay such legacies, and having paid them, he in consequence took a fee in the land devised, even though he would otherwise have taken only a life estate.

IV. Where a will gives cross remainders or the estate to a "survivor of two or more persons living," it converts what might otherwise be a fee into a life estate from "the plain and forcible import of the word 'survivor.'" In such case the time of the death of the first taker is fixed, not with reference to that of the testator but of some other designated person—the first taker. In both cases the term when the estate of the first taker shall cease is definitely fixed by a death other than that of the testator himself.

Mr. Edwin Countryman, with Messrs. Hungerford & Hotaling, for respondents:

I. Words in a will are in all cases to receive a construction which will give effect to every expression, rather than one that will render any of the expressions inoperative.

1 Redf. Wills, 427; Jarman's Rule, No. 16.

Where the testator uses an additional word or phrase he must be presumed to have an additional meaning, to which some effect must be given.

1 Redf. Wills, 427; Jarman's Rule, No. 18.

In the construction of wills, the intention is to be ascertained by the consideration of the whole instrument. Effect is to be given, if possible, to all of its provisions; and no clause is to be rejected.

Taggart v. Murray, 58 N. Y. 233, 236. See also Norris v. Beyea, 18 N. Y. 273, 283; 1 Redf. Wills, 433, No. 17, sub. 2; Id. 435, No. 21; Hoxie v. Hoxie, 7 Paige, 187, 192.

When it is apparent that particular words have been inadvertently used in an inexact and ambiguous sense, they should be read in the actual sense in which they were employed by the testator, although this may vary from their ordinary and primary import.

II. All the authorities concur, where similar provisions have been construed by the courts, in reaching the same result, thus apparent in this case as the intention of the testator. The testator gave to his son Cornelius a contingent estate in fee, subject to be and which was reduced to a life estate by his death without issue; and the fee then passed to the grandchildren.

Buel v. Southwick, 70 N. Y. 581; Nellis v. Nellis, 99 N. Y. 505; S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 296; Kelso v. Lorillard, 35 N. Y. 177; Dumond v. Stringham, 26 Barb. 105; Sherman v. Sherman, 3 Barb. 385; Britton v. Thornton, 112 U. S. 526 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 816).

III. The appellants' counsel ignore the condition annexed to the devise, making it subject to the contingency provided for in the tenth item, and assume death to be uncertain or contingent; whereas, its time only is uncertain. One's condition when he may happen to die, as "without lawful issue", is uncertain; and one having an estate, the duration of which depends upon his dying without issue, has a contingent estate; for upon the happening of the contingency his estate ends; and the death mentioned in the provision creating such estate necessarily refers to the time of his dying without issue whenever he may happen to die, in the condition or under the circumstances expressed.

Kelly v. Kelly, 5 Lans. 448, 448; S. C. affd. 61 N. Y. 47.

Where the estate intended to be devised to the first taker is only a life estate, he cannot have a contingent estate in fee, liable to be reduced to a life estate, for no such estate is intended; and it will be seen that most of the cases cited by appellants are of that class, and that in none of those relied upon by the appellants did the testator intend to devise a fee to the first taker, subject to the contingency of his dying without issue, and in that event to devise the estate of the one so dying to others.

But on the other hand, in cases with like features and giving construction to devises subject to like contingencies as here, the courts have uniformly held that the death referred to was a dying without issue, whenever it should happen.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented in this case is whether Cornelius Vanderzee took, under the will of his father, Harmon Vanderzee, an estate in fee simple in the homestead farm, or a fee subject to a conditional limitation in favor of the four grandchildren of the testator, named in the will, in the event of the death of Cornelius without issue.

The testator died in 1840. His son Cornelius entered under the devise and continued in possession of the farm until his death in 1876. The plaintiff Cornelius Vanderzee is one of the four grandchildren named in the will; and his right to maintain this action depends upon the nature and quality of the title which the testator's son Cornelius took under the will of his father.

The will is brief, and is a will of real estate exclusively. The testator in the first clause directs that his debts and funeral charges shall be first paid out of his estate. The second clause is as follows:

"All my real estate as now in my actual possession, being my homestead farm situated in the County of Albany, I devise to my son Cornelius, subject to the proviso hereinafter contained."

The third clause directs that his wife, if she survive him, shall have an ample support from and out of the estate devised to Cornelius, during her life. The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth clauses bequeath severally to his three daughters, his son Tunis and his grandson Harmon Slingerland, money legacies amounting in the aggregate to $1,700. The ninth and tenth clauses are as follows:

"Ninth. The legacies above mentioned are to be paid to the legatees, by my son Cornelius, in consideration of my devising unto him the afore mentioned real estate, to be paid to them respectively within two years after my death. Tenth. In conclusion, my will is that if my son Cornelius dies without issue, that then the estate herein devised to him shall go to my grandchildren hereinafter named: Harmon T. Vanderzee, Cornelius T. Vanderzee, sons of my son Tunis; Harmon Slingerland, son of my daughter Elizabeth, deceased; and Harmon Houghtaling, son of my daughter Eve, share and share alike; and in case my son Cornelius should die before the provisions of this will become an act, the devisees last named shall perform and fulfill all the conditions required of my son Cornelius to the legatees named in this my will."

The whole question is whether the words "if my son Cornelius dies without issue," in the tenth clause, refer to the event of his death before that of the testator, or to a death at any time whether before or after the testator's death. If the former is the true meaning, the gift over to the grandchildren was substitutionary merely, depending on the contingency of the death of the primary devisee in the life time of the testator, and designed to prevent a lapse; and upon that construction, Cornelius having survived the testator, the contingency upon which the grandchildren were to take was gone, and Cornelius took an absolute fee.

If on the other hand the words refer to a death at any time under the circumstances mentioned, then on the death of the testator the grandchildren took a contingent interest under the will, by way of executory devise, which on the death of Cornelius without issue was converted into a fee in them, thereby displacing and subverting the conditional fee before that time vested in Cornelius. It has been claimed indeed that the devise to Cornelius was of a life estate only. But this is, we think, an inadmissible construction of the devise.

The devise was in terms of all the testator's real estate in possession, and the language is sufficient both at common law and under the statute, without words of inheritance, to embrace the fee (1 R. S. 748, § 1); and the gift over, in the event only of the death of Cornelius without issue, furnishes the strongest ground of implication that the testator intended to vest in Cornelius a title transmissible by descent to his issue.

It is said by Mr. Jarman (2 Jarm. Wills, 752) to be an established rule that where a bequest is simply to one person, and in case of his death to another, the primary devisee surviving the testator, takes absolutely. This rule applies both to real and personal estate, and so far as I know the authorities in this country uniformly sustain the construction that where there is a devise or bequest simpliciter to one person, and in case of his death, to another, the words refer to a death in the lifetime of the testator. Moore v. Lyons, 25 Wend. 119; Kelly v. Kelly, 61 N. Y. 47; Briggs v. Shaw, 9 Allen, 516; Whitney v. Whitney, 45 N. H. 811.

It is said in support of this construction that as death, the most certain of all things, is not a contingent event, but the time only, the words of contingency in a devise of the character mentioned, can be satisfied only by referring them to a death before a particular period; and as no other period is mentioned, it is necessarily presumed that the time referred to is the testator's own death. See Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357.

We think this construction, although supported by somewhat refined and technical reasoning, stands more strongly, in most cases at least, upon the probable intention of the testator. It prevents the disinheritance of a testator's posterity, which would often happen if a death of the primary legatee at any time, was held to be within the meaning of the devise.

It may be safely assumed that where a will is dictated under the influence of family relations, it would seldom happen that a testator would intentionally cut off the issue of a son or daughter from taking the share of the parent in his estate, for the benefit of collateral objects.

There are cases of another class than the one mentioned, in which an alternative limitation, depending upon the death of a primary legatee or devisee, is also held to refer to a death in the life time of the testator, although the cases are not within the reason upon which the construction in the class of cases first referred to is supported.

One of the cases of the second class is where a devise is made to A, and in case of his death without issue or without children or without leaving an lawful heir, then to B. It is manifest that the event on which the gift over is to take effect is distinctly pointed out and is uncertain and contingent, viz.: death without issue, etc.; and it is not necessary in order to give effect to the words of contingency, to refer the death to one happening before the death of the testator. So also such a construction is not necessary to prevent the disinheritance of issue, for it is only in the event that there is no issue that the gift over is to operate.

It is said by Mr. Jarman (2 Jarm. 783) that the general rule is that where the context is silent, the words referring to the death of the prior legatee, in connection with some collateral event, apply to the contingency happening as well after as before the death of the testator. It will be observed that the rule as stated by the learned author relates to personal property and is deduced from the later English cases upon the construction of bequests of personalty, coupled with a contingency, which seem to have modified the earlier decisions. But where real estate is devised in terms denoting an intention that the primary devisee shall take a fee on the death of the testator, followed by a devise over in case of his death without issue, it has I think been uniformly held in England, and it is the rule supported by the preponderance of judicial authority in this country, that the words refer to a death without issue, in the life time of the testator; and that the primary devisee surviving the testator, takes an absolute estate in fee simple. Clayton v. Lowe, 5 Barn. & Ald. 686; Gee v. Mayor of Manchester, 17 Adol. & Ell. N. S. 787; Woodburne v. Woodburne, 28 L. J. Ch. 336; Doe v. Sparrow, 18 East, 359; Quackenbos v. Kingsland, Mss. N. Y. Ct. of Appeals [reported in 2 Cent. Rep. 918]; Livingston v. Greene, 52 N. Y. 118; Embury v. Sheldon, 68 N. Y. 227; Waugh's App. 78 Pa. 436; Mickley's App. 92 Pa. 514. But see Britton v. Thornton, 112 U. S. 526 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 816.]

The case of Quackenbos v. Kingsland, supra, was that of a devise by the testator of the residue of the real and personal estate to "my son Daniel Kingsland, and to his heirs; but in case my son Daniel should die without lawful issue, I give and bequeath it to my remaining children, share and share alike," and it was held in exact conformity with the decisions to which we have referred, that the words referred to the death of the primary devisee in the life time of the testator.

This rule of construction in this class of cases is founded in part upon the disinclination of the courts to cut down a fee once given, except upon clear words; but rests more upon authority and precedent than reason, for it is by no means certain that it was not the intention of the testator to control and provide for the ulterior devolution of the title, after it had been enjoyed during life by the primary devisee, in case he then died without issue, and such a construction would, it would seem, give effect more completely to the language used.

But the rule established by the courts applies only where the context of the will is silent, and affords no indication of intention other than that disclosed by words of absolute gift, followed by a gift over in case of death, or of death without issue or other specified event. Indeed, the tendency is to lay hold of slight circumstances in the will, to vary the construction and to give effect to the language according to its natural import. Muel v. Southwick, 70 N. Y. 581; Nellis v. Nellis, 99 N. Y. 505; [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 296]; Hennessey v. Patterson, 85 N. Y. 92.

In these and other cases which might be cited the court found in the context indications of intention which took them out of the operation of the rule to which we have referred.

We are of opinion that there are indications in the will now before us that the testator intended that the gift over to the grandchildren should take effect upon the death of his son Cornelius without issue, at any time, either before or after his own death; and that the rule of construction which applies to the words "death without issue," when standing alone, does not apply to the will in question.

The gift to Cornelius in the second clause of the will, is made "subject to the proviso hereinafter contained." Reading this clause by itself, we should naturally expect to find in a subsequent part of the will, some condition modifying in some contingency the estate given to Cornelius; and while the condition might consistently with the language of the second clause be either precedent or subsequent, the more natural meaning suggested by the words, "subject to the proviso hereinafter mentioned," would be that the testator intended to subject the estate in the hands or possession of Cornelius, when he should take it under the will to some condition.

Looking then at the tenth clause, we find a condition or proviso, which is that on the death of Cornelius without issue, the estate should go over to the grandchildren. This provision in the tenth clause, standing alone, would, according to the general rule of construction, be construed as referring to the death of Cornelius, without issue, during the testator's life. But construed in connection with the natural meaning of the second clause, there is color for a conclusion that it referred to a death either before or after the testator's. But more satisfactory evidence that the testator referred to a death at any time, is found in the last paragraph of the tenth clause, which declares, "in case my son Cornelius should die before the provisions of this will becomes an act, the devisees last named (the grandchildren) shall perform and fulfill all the conditions required of my son Cornelius to the legatees named in this my will."

It seems obvious that the duty imposed upon the grandchildren by this clause was a duty to be discharged by reason of an omission or default of Cornelius to satisfy the legacies. If the only object of this clause was simply to impose upon the grandchildren the duty of paying the legacies in case the alternative gift took effect by the death of Cornelius, without issue, in the life time of the testator, so that thereby they became primary devisees, the testator would naturally have expressed his intention in simple and clear language, as by declaring in connection with the gift over that the grandchildren should pay the legacies, or that they should take the land, subject to their payment.

The phrase "in case my son Cornelius should die before the provisions of this will become an act," is obscure. But it is to be observed that Cornelius had by the terms of the ninth clause, two years in which to pay the legacies. The testator must be assumed to have had in mind two contingencies: 1, that Cornelius might die before him, without issue; or 2, after him, but within the two years and before he had paid the legacies.

The last paragraph of the tenth clause, was inserted we think to provide for both contingencies; and the burden of paying the legacies was imposed upon the ulterior devisees, in case of the death of Cornelius either before the testator, or after his death and within the two years, in case the direction for their payment should then be unexecuted.

If this is the fair construction of the clause, then it is clear that the words "death without issue" referred to a death at any time, because it is inconceivable that the testator could have intended that the grandchildren should pay the legacies, except in the event of their taking under the devise. The clause is not that in case Cornelius dies before the will takes effect, then the grandchildren shall pay the legacies; but "in case he dies before the provisions of this will becomes an act" i. e., before he shall have paid the legacies. The legacies were an equitable charge on the land. Harris v. Fly, 7 Paige, 422.

The fact that they were also personally charged on Cornelius does not we think require us to hold that he took a fee simple. The circumstance that a devisee is personally charged with the payment of legacies is a fact resorted to in doubtful cases, in aid of the construction of a devise; but is never decisive where a different intention is disclosed.

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

v.

STATE of New York, Resp't.

1. A judgment in an action of tort to recover money alleged to have been obtained by fraud is not a bar to a subsequent action to recover the same money, on the ground that it had been paid under a mistake of fact.
2. Facts offered in evidence to prove an issue are not themselves in issue, and the judgment is no evidence in regard to them.
3. When a creditor has received more than was due him from his debtor, the excess is deemed so much money of the debtor in the hands of the creditor for the use of the debtor; and if, on a subsequent transaction between the parties, the debtor becomes again indebted, such excess will be presumed to have been applied by the creditor upon the subsequent indebtedness when it accrued, and the debtor will not be deprived of the benefit of such application by force of the Statute of Limitations, in an action by the creditor for the entire indebtedness.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from an order and judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term, in the Fourth Department, affirming a decision of the late Board of Audit disallowing and dismissing claimants' claim. Affirmed.

Reported below, 81 Hun, 409.

The questions presented by this appeal are stated in the opinion.

The defendants in the case of People v. Denison, 80 N. Y. 656, referred to in the opinion, were the same parties as the original claimants in this proceeding, they having been partners in the contracts in suit.

Messrs. E. Nottingham and Martin A. Knapp, for appellants :

I. The reasoning of the general term is "that while it was held by this court in People v. Denison that the State could not recover this money in an action in tort for the fraud, it was not held that the State could not have recovered if it had brought an action ex contractu on the implied promise; therefore, the adjudication in that action is not conclusive in this case."

This reasoning might be true if the parties in the actions were not the same; but as applied to actions between the same parties, as in the present case, it is clearly erroneous.

When the State appealed in the case of *People v. The defense of the Statute of Limitations interposed by the State is untenable. The seals attached to the contracts take them out of the six years' limitation.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for the State, respondent :

The claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Code Civ. Proc. § 382, subd. 1.

The seal of the canal commissioners was not the seal of the State, and the instruments were executed by them as agents of the State.

Randall v. Van Vechten, 19 Johns. 60, 64.

These contracts were not required to be under seal; and in such cases, where the contract was executed by an agent in behalf of his principal, and the latter has ratified the contract by accepting its benefits, the seal may be rejected as surplusage and a recovery had against the principal in assumpsit, as if it were a simple contract.

Randall v. Van Vechten, supra; Briggs v. Partridge, 64 N. Y. 364; Stanton v. Camp, 4 Barb. 274.

These contracts could not have been specifically enforced, even if the claimants had properly and completely performed their covenant; because no measure of damages was provided for therein. Even had the claimants sought a specific performance thereof, such a suit would not have been a suit upon a sealed instrument.

That this claim is in the nature of an action of assumpsit is clear from an examination of the following cases:

There was nothing equitably due the plaintiffs. The moneys paid to the claimants under contract A were paid under a mistake of fact and for that reason could have been recovered back in a direct action for that purpose.

Lawrence v. Am. Nat. Bk. 54 N. Y. 433.

There must be a mistake, and it must also appear that the plaintiff was not under either a legal or moral obligation to pay the money.

Where money is paid to another under the influence of a mistake, i. e., on the supposition that a specific fact is true, which would entitle the other to the money, but which fact is untrue and the money would not have been paid if the fact had been known to the payor, an action will lie to recover it back.

The auditor determined whether the money was to be paid.

Laws 1869, chap. 877, § 1.

The auditor paid the contractors, relying upon the estimate of the engineers; in ignorance of the over measurements and defective character of the work. As the agent's mistake of fact is the mistake of his principal, the money was paid by the plaintiff, relying upon erroneous vouchers produced by the defendants at the time, and can, even if there was no fraud, be recovered back as money paid by mistake.

Had the engineer actually accepted the work, still the State would not be bound, because the proof shows that such acceptance would have been of a class of work inferior to that provided for in the contract.

See People v. Schuyler, 69 N. Y. 242.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the second of December, 1881, the appellants presented to the board of audit a claim for $125,406.90, with interest on $91,044.00 part thereof from December 1, 1881, and on the second of May, 1882, a further claim, by way of amendment to the original claim, of $28,410.58, with interest from May 1, 1882, making the total amount claimed $158,817.48; and for this sum, with interest, asked an award in their favor and against the State.

The claim is for money alleged to have been earned under three contracts for canal work dated September 9, 1869, and referred to respectively as A, B and C.

It seems apparent that upon contract B there was unpaid $7,605, with interest; and on contract C $9,750, with interest. But the board of audit found that for work done under contract A the claimants were entitled only to $814,960.70, and had in fact been paid $417,570.00; leaving due the State, for over payment, the sum of $102,610.30. It therefore held: 1, that contract A had been fully performed by the State; and 2, that so much of the over payment, under color of that contract, as might be necessary, should be applied to extinguish the amounts otherwise due on contracts B and C; that for the balance, viz.: $35,368.40, the claimants were indebted to the State, and accordingly dismissed their claim.

There is evidence in the case to support the conclusion of over payment, and the question upon this appeal is whether it is available to the State.

The appellants contend that the decision by this court in People v. Denison, 80 N. Y. 656, is conclusive against the State, as to the payments in excess of sums rightfully due under contract A. In that case the State sued to recover back the whole sum of $417,571.00, upon the sole ground that it had been obtained from its officers by false pretenses and false certificates.

The defendants answered and, among other defenses, set up a certain claim for $73,674.05, as yet due upon that contract, being, as is now stated, the same moneys claimed before the board of audit under contract A.

The State succeeded upon the trial, but upon appeal both the supreme court at general term and this court held that the action was in tort, and not on contract; and reversed the judgment rendered by the trial court, upon the ground that the plaintiff, having failed to establish the fraud alleged, had not made out its case.

The supreme court had granted a new trial, but the plaintiff stipulated so as to perfect an appeal, and this court, in pursuance of the stipulation, gave judgment absolute against it.

Such a judgment presents no obstacle to the recovery of money paid by the state officers in ignorance that the amount of work and materials in the estimates on which they acted was incorrectly stated and in excess of that really done or furnished, and under a mistake as to those facts.

That question was neither litigated nor decided in the former action, nor could it have been. It was not involved in the pleadings nor presented for determination. Moreover, evidence, however ample to warrant a recovery for money paid under a mistake of fact, would be wholly insufficient to show that its payment was procured by fraud. The cause of action is not the same.

The judgment relieved the contractor from the imputation and the consequences of obtaining the money fraudulently; but it did not establish the fact of indebtedness, nor confirm a title to the money, if it was otherwise defective. The plaintiff failed because its action was misconceived, and for a cause not warranted by the facts proved. The judgment is no bar to a claim therefore, for a sufficient cause, or where the evidence to sustain the second would not have entitled the plaintiff to recover in the first; where, in other words, there is no identity of the question with that before decided.

It is entirely consistent with the record in that action, that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered back. Although the State there failed in its assertion that the money was obtained from its officers by fraud and false pretenses, that question was settled, but not the right of the defendant to retain it.

Nor does that judgment establish the sum due to the appellants under contract. That question was not in issue. It may have come collaterally in question; and as incident to the general charge of fraud, it may have been the subject of evidence and controversy, but it was not in issue within the meaning of the rule which gives effect to the adjudication. That applies to that matter only upon which the plaintiff proceeded by its action, and which the defendants answered by their pleading.

Facts offered in evidence to establish the issue so presented are not themselves in issue, and the judgment is no evidence in regard to them. Jackson v. Wood, 8 Wend. 27; Lawrence v. Hunt, 10 Wend. 81; Remington Paper Co. v. O'Dougherty, 81 N. Y. 474.

The appellants contend that the Statute of Limitations barred the right to recover the over payments. Whether time had elapsed sufficient in any view for that purpose, I do not think it needful to inquire. No judgment has gone in favor of the State against the appellants. The money in their hands was in excess of that due from the State when they presented their claims, and a tribunal having the powers of a court not only of law but equity, and expressly charged to allow only such sums as it considered should equitably be paid by the State to the claimants (Laws of 1876, chap. 444, § 2), have adjudged that while retaining it they have no claim which can be allowed. That conclusion has been approved by a court authorized upon appeal to consider both the law and the evidence, "and determine the same between the claimant and the State, as shall be equitable and just." Laws 1881, chap. 211.

A different decision would be a reproach to either jurisdiction. The claimants could ask for only so much as was due to them, and before a court having power to take an account and strike a just balance between the parties it would be a surprising assertion for one to say:

"I obtained the money of my adversary under circumstances which imposed on me an obligation to repay; but in the meantime he became justly indebted to me, and as by lapse of time no action can be brought by him, I now demand that my title to the money so obtained shall not be questioned but be deemed absolute, and he be required to pay the debt which has accrued."

It might well be answered:

"You shall be deemed to have done your duty, and at the moment of the accruing of the claim, to have applied upon it the money which you have already received from your debtor."

So here, the money received by the claimants in over payment on one contract must be deemed to have been money in their hands for the use of the State, the State entitled to its application, and the claimants be presumed to have applied it in payment of the other obligation the moment it accrued.

The existence of means of payment in the hands of the creditor and the lapse of time are conclusive evidence of the pre-existing fact of an actual discharge of the accruing debt; or are of themselves facts which require a court of equity to adjudge such application to have been made. Equity requires that one demand should extinguish the other, by deducting the less from the greater.

Other propositions are advanced in behalf of the appellants. They are insufficient to disturb the judgment; nor do they answer the opinion of the general term.

As we agree, therefore, with that court and the board of audit in the conclusion reached by them, the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

v.

Alfred C. CHAPIN, Comptroller, etc., Resp't.

After the State Comptroller has made his decision upon an application to cancel a tax sale and conveyance thereunder, he cannot be required, by mandamus, to reach a different conclusion.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming an order of the Special Term denying a motion for a writ of peremptory mandamus requiring the State Comptroller to cancel the sale of certain lands for taxes. Affirmed.

The relator is the owner and holder of a mortgage upon certain lands situated in Clinton County, which in 1877 were sold for unpaid taxes for the years 1866-1870 inclusive; and a deed therefor was thereafter in due time given by the Comptroller to the State, as purchaser. In 1881 the lands were again sold for the unpaid taxes of 1871-1876 inclusive; and at the expiration of the time to redeem were again conveyed to the State, as required by law. November 20, 1885, the relator, as such mortgagee, applied to the Comptroller to cancel the sales and conveyances on the grounds:

1. That the oath of the assessors to the assessment roll of 1869 was not in the form required by statute (Laws 1855, chap. 427), in that the words "the" and "due" are omitted; the words "property" and "one" are substituted for "estate" and "person" respectively; the word "debt" is used instead of "debts," "stock" instead of "stocks," "is" in the place of "are," the words "true and full" instead of "full and true" and the word "information" instead of "judgment."

2. That said oath was sworn to before a notary public, instead of a justice of the peace.

3. That at the sale of 1881, the Comptroller refused to allow relator to bid on said lands, but peremptorily bid them in for the State.

The Comptroller denied the application; and the relator thereupon, at a special term held in Albany County, November 24, 1885, moved for a writ of peremptory mandamus to compel the Comptroller to cancel said sales. The motion was denied and an order entered accordingly, which was affirmed by the general term* and an appeal taken to this court.

Mr. Moore with Mr. Frank E. Smith, for relator, appellant:

The statute makes it the duty of the comptroller, on discovering the invalidity of any tax sale, to cancel such sale.

Laws 1855, chap. 427, §§ 83, 85; 8 Edm. Stat. at Large 370.

The land owner whose land has been illegally sold for taxes is entitled to invoke the exercise of this power vested in the comptroller.

Laws 1878, chap. 120.

Relator could not bring ejectment nor an action at law in any form against the State.

People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272.

Neither could he resort to equity, to cancel, as a cloud upon his title, the deed based upon an illegal sale; for the State can no more be sued in equity than at law.

Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 446 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 992).

The statute as to canceling tax sales applies to cases in which the State is the purchaser, as well as to those where the purchaser is an individual.

Laws 1855, chap. 427, § 86, as amended by Laws 1881, chap. 402, § 6, sub. 3.

The remedy by mandamus is the proper one. The writ of certiorari accomplishes nothing. It simply reverses erroneous action. If the officer persists in saying that he knows the law better than the courts, the party must then seek his remedy by mandamus.

See People v. Supers. of Madison Co. 51 N. Y. 442, 446; High, Extr. Legal Remedies, § 34, Code Civ. Proc. § 2070; Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477; Matter of Clementi, 92 N. Y. 591; People, ex rel. Townsend, v. Cady, 50 N. Y. Supr. (J. & S.) 899; People, ex rel. Andrews v. Brinkerhoff, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 391; Bd. of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for respondent:

Even if the Comptroller were wrong in refusing to cancel the tax sales, mandamus is not the proper or suitable remedy to afford the relator any relief. A writ of mandamus will not be awarded to compel an act by a public officer, in regard to which he may exercise his judgment or discretion.

People v. Troy, 78 N. Y. 33; Howland v. Eldredge, 48 N. Y. 457.

Where a subordinate body or officer is invested with power to determine a question of fact, it is a judicial duty.

People v. Troy, supra.

Mandamus will lie to compel a public officer to perform a duty imperatively imposed upon him by statute, where he refuses to act at all; but not to direct the manner in which he shall act.

See Howland v. Eldredge, supra; People v.

*The following is the opinion delivered at General Term:

PER CURIAM:

We think that the motion was properly denied. If the relator was entitled to review the Comptroller's decision, he should do so by certiorari, as was done in People v. Chapin, decided in this court, November, 1885. [See S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 467.]

Whether in a particular case under the statute the Comptroller decides on the question of fact or on a question of law, in either, his decision is quasi judicial. Section 2070 of the Code, to which the relator cites us, does not determine in what case mandamus will lie. It only determines that where mandamus is the proper remedy, then if the question be one of law, the mandamus may be peremptory in the first instance.

The relator also cites Matter of Clementi, 92 N. Y. 591. But it is remarked in that case that the proceeding was not for an adjudication upon the title, but to compel the defendant to perform a statutory duty, the effect of which, in case of dispute, must be determined hereafter. That language would hardly apply to the cancellation of a deed by the Comptroller, under the statute in question.

The remark in Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477, cited by the relator, was merely obiter. It did not state when mandamus and when certiorari would be the proper remedy.

The People v. Cady, 50 N. Y. Supr. Ct. 399, was a mandamus simply to compel a clerk of arrears to receive certain taxes, an act wholly ministerial.

In People v. Brinkerhoff, 20 Week. Dig. 391, the mandamus was refused.

The case of Atty-Gen. v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460, also cited by the relator, contains at page 473 a very good statement of the matter. Speaking of mandamus it says: "It lies, not only to ministerial but to judicial officers. In the former case it contains a mandate to do a specific act; but in the latter, only to adjudicate to exercise a discretion upon a particular subject."

Had the Comptroller refused utterly to consider the relator's application, there would be reason for asking a mandamus, not to direct the Comptroller how to act but to require him to exercise his discretion. But the Comptroller has not refused the relator's application. He has considered it and denied it.

The proper use of remedy by mandamus is also stated in People v. Troy, 78 N. Y. 33, 39.

It is not a remedy for erroneous decisions. It cannot be addressed to a judicial tribunal to require it to decide in a particular manner. And this rule applies to everybody whose action is in its nature judicial.

In chapter 427, Laws 1855, § 83, we find the following: "Whenever the comptroller shall discover * * * that the sale was, for any cause whatever, invalid or ineffectual to give title, etc." Now, this certainly does not describe a ministerial duty. It is for the comptroller to "discover" that is, to decide that the sale is invalid. That decision may depend upon a question of fact or upon a question of law, or upon both. In deciding it the comptroller may err in point of law or in point of fact. But in one case as in the other, the remedy for the aggrieved party is by certiorari; that is to say, assuming that there can be a review of the comptroller's action.

Without passing upon the other questions, therefore, the order should be affirmed, with $10 costs and printing disbursements.

Leonard, 74 N. Y. 448. See also, People v. Fairman, 12 Abb. N. C. 252, 263.

The writ will not issue where the aggrieved party has another remedy.

People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 114; People v. Dowling, 55 Barb. 197; People v. Campbell, 72 N. Y. 496. See People v. Thompson, 99 N. Y. 641.

If the lien created by the Comptroller's deed appears valid on its face, an action will lie to remove the lien as a cloud upon the owner's title.

Scott v. Onderdonk, 14 N. Y. 9; Marsh v. Brooklyn, 59 N. Y. 280; Dederer v. Voorhies, 81 N. Y. 156.

Certiorari would be the proper proceeding to review the Comptroller's decision in this matter.

Clark v. Davenport, 95 N. Y. 477.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Comptroller acted upon the papers presented to him and refused the application, upon the ground that the sales were regular. The matter was for his determination; and we agree with the supreme court, in the opinion that he cannot by mandamus be required to reach a different conclusion. Howland v. Eldredge, 43 N. Y. 457.

Order affirmed, with costs.

The questions presented by the appeal are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Gardner, for appellant:

The extinguishment of a valid debt against the vendor constitutes the vendee a purchaser for value, as fully as though the consideration was all paid in money.

See Seymour v. Wilson, 19 N. Y. 417; Bedell v. Chase, 34 N. Y. 886; Hill v. Northrup, 9 How. Pr. 525.

If the transfer is made to a stranger, in order to bring himself within the provisions of the statute as to a purchaser, "he must show that he has an equity which is paramount to that of the vendor; and to do this he must show that he has parted with value and is not chargeable with notice of the fraud. But where the transfer is to a creditor of the vendor, it is not necessary to show a new consideration, as the transaction amounts to nothing more than a voluntary preference of one creditor over another."

Where the land is conveyed to the grantee as his own, the rule is entirely different from a case where a party makes a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and the grantee is a mere trustee; in the latter case fraud of the assignor alone is sufficient; while in the former, as in this case, actual fraud must be shown upon the part of both grantor and grantee.

Laidlaw v. Gilmore, 47 How. Pr. 67; S. C. affd. 56 N. Y. 621.

Wait, Fraud. Convey. § 208.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to vacate and annul a conveyance of certain land made by one Grace to the defendant Jacobs, upon the ground that it was executed and delivered for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding creditors, and particularly the plaintiff, in the collection of a debt owing to him by the defendant Grace.

The findings of the court below show that Jacobs paid Grace the full value of the land upon the transfer; but it is claimed by the respondent and was found by the court below that the evidence established the fact that the conveyance was nevertheless made and received with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiff. The evidence upon which this finding was based was not conclusive or even strongly preponderating, upon the facts found and the erroneous admission or exclusion of evidence was likely to effect materially the conclusions reached by the trial court.

The payment, by the purchaser, of a fair consideration upon a sale of property affords strong evidence of the good faith of the transaction and, while not conclusive upon that question, requires clear evidence of the existence of fraudulent intent, to overcome the presumption of honest motives arising from that fact. Billings v. Russell, 101 N. Y. 226; [S. C. sub nom. Billings v. Sawyer, 2 Cent. Rep. 143].

One of the most prominent circumstances from which a fraudulent intent was sought to be deduced was the execution by Grace on the same day, but after the execution of the deed in question, of a chattel mortgage to his wife, conveying such property as he had remaining after the transfer of his land. This fact was proved upon the oral examination of the alleged fraudulent debtor, produced as a witness for the plaintiff; and although the defendant objected that such evidence was not competent and that the mortgage should be produced, it was allowed by the court.

The defendant, upon cross examination of the same witness, attempted to show what was done with the mortgage after its execution, and the circumstances under which it was given; but upon the objection of the plaintiff the evidence was excluded by the court, and the defendant excepted to the ruling. We see no ground upon which this ruling can be supported.

The mere giving of the mortgage, under the circumstances, did not afford conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent on the part of the mortgagor; and the circumstances under which it was executed, the existence of a valuable consideration therefor, the fact that it was promptly filed in the town clerk's office, and the publicity attending its execution, were all competent and material facts bearing upon the question of intent, and should have been received by the court.

In a case where the evidence is not preponderating on one side or the other, such circumstances should be heard and considered; and we cannot say that injustice may not have been done by the exclusion of the proposed testimony.

For this reason, therefore, a new trial should be ordered with costs to abide the event.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment upon the report of a referee, dismissing the complaint in an action for the unlawful taking and conversion of personal property. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 34 Hun, 624.

Statement by Danforth, J.:

The plaintiffs sue in trespass to recover damages for the unlawful and forcible taking by the defendant from their possession, and the conversion to his use, of certain horses and other personal property belonging to them.

The complaint contains the usual allegations in such cases; and the defendant, after a general denial, sets up by answer that at the time mentioned in the complaint, he was sheriff of Erie County, and in that character did the things complained of, by virtue of certain executions against one Shoemaker; that the property taken by him was not the property of the plaintiffs, but belonged either to the execution debtor or to one Allen as his assignee; and who, the defendant alleges, resides in this State and is a necessary party to the action. He also alleges a lien for $91 in favor of Allen as such assignee, for the care, etc., of the property, and its payment by defendant.

Some other matters are set out, but they are not material upon this appeal. The record does not contain the evidence, but from the report of the referee it appears that the following facts were found by him: on the first day of January, 1880, said Shoemaker resided in the City of Buffalo and was engaged in the manufacture and sale of ale and porter. At the same time one Marvin Cline, of the same city, was engaged in the manufacture and sale of malt; and on that day Shoemaker was indebted to Cline in a large sum of money upon certain promissory notes, made by Shoemaker and payable to the order of Cline; and he then, in consideration of said indebtedness, executed to Cline an instrument in writing, wherein he transferred and sold to him certain "goods, chattels, wares and merchandise," and among other things the property described in the complaint, upon the condition, as expressed in said instrument, that "If the party of the first part shall pay, take up and discharge the said promissory notes at the maturity thereof, and if he shall pay any other promissory note or notes, which shall be indorsed by the said Marvin Cline at his request and for his accommodation * * * then and in that event this instrument shall become null and void, and of no effect whatever."

That at the time of its execution and delivery it was agreed by said Cline and understood by said Shoemaker that it would not be filed until Cline should notify him, and that Shoemaker should continue to carry on his business the same as before, which he did until the assignment hereinafter mentioned; and Cline did not take possession of the property, but the same continued in the possession of Shoemaker up to about the 20th day of July, 1880, when he executed a general assignment to one Allen, for the benefit of his creditors, except so far as said property was changed by Shoemaker, in the conduct of his business.

That within a day or two after the delivery of this instrument to Cline, he delivered it to the plaintiffs, "to secure paper of said Shoemaker, which then was or might be in existence;" and on the 11th of June thereafter, executed to them in writing an absolute assignment of all his interest in said bill of sale, and it remained in their possession.

That said instrument and assignment were filed on the 25th day of June, 1880, in the office of the Clerk of Erie County.

That after said instrument was delivered to Cline, he furnished moneys and supplied malt to said Shoemaker, to be used by said Shoemaker in his business; and said Shoemaker gave to said Cline therefor certain promissory notes. Each of the notes was made, by said Shoemaker, payable to the order of said Cline. Cline indorsed and delivered all of them to the plaintiffs herein, in the usual course of business and for a valuable consideration, and they now hold the same.

That on the 20th day of July, 1880, the plaintiffs went to the place of business of Shoemaker, in the City of Buffalo, and there found said Shoemaker and Allen, his assignee, and demanded and took possession of the property described in the complaint herein, under and by virtue of the said instrument, with the permission of said Shoemaker and said Allen, and without objection on the part of either of them; and the plaintiffs thereupon caused said property to be advertised for sale under and by virtue of said instrument.

That after the making and delivery of said instrument, and before the written assignment thereof was made by said Cline to said plaintiffs, the said Shoemaker made or indorsed to the Third National Bank of Buffalo certain promissory notes; that the same were not paid when they became due, and judgments were duly recovered thereon by said bank against said Shoemaker and others; and executions were duly issued against the property of the judgment debtors to the defendant as Sheriff of the County of Erie.

That the judgments were not recovered until after the plaintiffs had taken possession of the property described in the complaint.

That the defendant, under and by virtue of such execution, thereafter levied upon and took possession of and sold the property described in the complaint, and which was then of the value of $6,043.75.

And the referee found as conclusions of law:

First, that said instrument executed by Shoemaker was void as against the Third National Bank of Buffalo and as against creditors of and purchasers in good faith from said Shoemaker.

Second, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain the action and the defendant is entitled to judgment dismissing the complaint.

After judgment in pursuance of this report, it was affirmed by the general term of the supreme court, and the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. Spencer Clinton with Mr. Alonzo Tanner, for appellants:

Possession by the plaintiffs was sufficient to enable them to maintain the action, the defendant being a wrong doer.

The failure to file the bill of sale (which was in reality a mortgage) made it absolutely void as to all persons who became creditors, by contract or otherwise, of Shoemaker, while it was not on file.

This is so as to simple contract creditors who have no judgment.

The Act does not change the effect of not parting with possession, but only adds another ground to those already existing, upon which a mortgage can be declared void.

If the mortgage is not filed and there is no immediate and continued change of possession, it is absolutely void as to all creditors.

This will be the case, although the agreement is not found in the instrument itself.

Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 168; Delaware v. Ensign, 21 Barb. 85.

Such an agreement may be inferred from the fact that such sales were made; and if such agreement is inferred, the instrument is absolutely fraudulent and void as to creditors.

Russell v. Winne, 37 N. Y. 591.

There is no distinction now between bills of sale given as security and chattel mortgages; although formerly a bill of sale was absolutely void if not followed by an immediate change of possession, while the omission to have a change of possession on the part of a mortgagor could be explained.

The fact that plaintiffs obtained possession, under and by virtue of their void mortgage, one day before defendant's levy on execution, does not give them a cause of action.

While the statute gives the assignee the right to maintain an action to set aside a mortgage, given by the assignor, as fraudulent towards creditors, it does not thereby take it away from a judgment creditor.

Crouse v. Frothingham, 97 N. Y. 105; Devey v. Moyer, 72 N. Y. 70.

The right way in which to test a pretended title is to sell on execution, indemnify the sheriff and defend him when he is sued.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon these facts this appeal should succeed. The plaintiffs were in actual possession of the property when the defendant, against their will, forcibly seized, removed and sold it. This was enough without any other evidence of title to maintain the action (Stowell v. Otis, 71 N. Y. 36), except against the true owner or one connecting himself in some way with the true owner.

The general denial does not avail the defendant, for justification is not admissible under it. The only defense is in the affirmative answer, which sets up that the property seized was the property of Shoemaker or the property of Levi Allen, as his assignee.

So far as this answer merely shows title out of the plaintiffs, it is of no consequence. If the title is in fact in Allen, the defendant does not connect himself with it. He must therefore rely on showing title in Shoemaker, against whose property only he has execution. This he does not do. On the contrary, the answer asserts that Allen, as assignee of the goods, etc., of Shoemaker, is a necessary party to the action; but no steps appear to have been taken to bring him in, in accordance with this averment.

The referee in substance finds that on the 20th of July, 1880, and before the judgment against him was obtained, Shoemaker executed a general assignment of all his property, including that in question, to Allen, for the benefit of his creditors; and by necessary implication he also finds that on that day he delivered possession of it to his assignee; for he says Shoemaker continued in possession until he executed the assignment.

The assignee is not a party to the suit, and the defendant's justification fails because he shows that the title is in Allen, against whom he has no claim. It is conceded in the opinion of the court below that if the judgment creditor was seeking to secure the avails of the mortgaged property by proceedings in the nature of a creditor's bill, and did not attack the assignment as well as the mortgage, then it would not be entitled to relief, because a judgment setting aside the incumbrance by mortgage, would not afford the bank any relief, as the property or the avails of it would belong to the assignee; and so it was held by us in Spring v. Short, 90 N. Y. 538.

The form of the action is immaterial where the same facts appear. Here they do. The respondent argues that showing title in Allen will not enable the plaintiffs to sustain the action, without that title has been transferred to them. Doubtless that is so. They did not need to show it. Possession was enough, prima facie, to sustain the action; and it does appear, moreover, that possession was taken by Allen's permission. But as the goods when seized by the defendant were in the actual possession of the plaintiffs, the burden was upon the defendant, either to prove title in Shoemaker or to connect himself with Allen's title and show that the taking was by his authority or by virtue of process or right acquired by legal proceedings against him. Merritt v. Lyon, 3 Barb. 110; Demick v. Chapman, 11 Johns. 132; Hurd v. West, 7 Cow. 752.

Neither of these things was accomplished. No invalidity is found as to the assignment, nor any unwillingness on the part of the assignee to perform his duty under it. He stands, not a mere representative of the debtor but of the rights of creditors; and may impeach the assignor's conveyances, although the debtor could not do so. Laws 1858, chap. 314.

So also, as the title to the property passed to him by the assignment, he could doubtless, as the defendant's counsel says, maintain this action in trover. He could do so because he was the general owner. But so also could the plaintiffs, because their possession was, upon the findings of the referee, by the permission of the assignee. They had thus a special property, or interest in the articles, and a recovery by either would be a bar to an action by the other. But it is enough to justify this action that at the time the defendant levied, the judgment and execution debtor had no right or interest in the property, it having passed from him by the prior assignment to Allen. It then ceased to be his property, and as this was before judgment, so of course it was before execution issued; and the goods were neither actually nor constructively bound by it. 2 R. S. 365, § 13; Code, § 1405.

It is therefore unnecessary to consider other questions raised by the appellants, or anticipate how they may stand upon another trial.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Knowledge of fraud which will entitle a vendor to rescind a sale is essential to put him to an election of remedies. Hence where, in an action by vendor in disaffirmance of the contract, there is no finding or request to find that, at the time of bringing a previous action for the contract price of the goods sold, plaintiff knew of the fraud, no error is disclosed in a ruling that the bringing of the action on the contract was not a waiver of the right to disaffirm.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term, in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff on the report of a referee, in an action of trover. Affirmed.

Reported below, 33 Hun, 169.

Trover for certain stoves and stove furniture, claimed to be the property of the plaintiff and to have been converted by one Thompson Hersee to his own use.

Thompson Hersee, the original defendant, died after suit brought, and his executrix has been substituted in his stead.

The property in question was sold and delivered by the plaintiff in the summer and fall of 1876 to the firm of M. Fisher & Co. on credit. The firm was engaged in the business of selling stoves and hollowware in the City of Buffalo, where the defendant resided. At the time of the purchase, the firm was insolvent and was indebted in a large amount, nearly $10,000 of which was owing to the defendant.

The plaintiff claims that it was induced to sell said goods to said firm, on credit, by false and fraudulent representations made by Fisher as to the means and pecuniary condition of the firm; and that said firm, knowing its insolvency, purchased the said goods with intent not to pay for them.

On the 12th of August, 1876, the original defendant herein commenced an action against the members of said firm, in which he claimed judgment against them for the sum of $9,471.34, besides interest, upon promissory notes executed by said firm to him, at different dates, from the first of May, 1872 to the 29th of July, 1876. The defendants in that action made default, and Hersee did not enter up judgment against them until the 23d of October, 1876. Most of the goods which form the subject of this action were delivered to Fisher & Co., and received by them after Hersee sued them and before he entered up judgment. Soon after the said judgment was docketed, Hersee, by virtue of an execution issued on the same, levied upon a portion of said property of the value of $711.50, and bid them off at sheriff's sale, applying the amount of his bid towards the satisfaction of his said judgment. The plaintiff was informed of Hersee's judgment in October, soon after it was obtained.

On the 25th of November, 1876, the plaintiff signed an agreement to compromise its debt against Fisher & Co. at twenty-five cents on the dollar, conditioned, however, that it was not to be binding until all the creditors assented to the same. At the time of signing said compromise, the plaintiff had an oral stipulation with Fisher & Co. for a preference. The conditions of the compromise were not fulfilled and the plaintiff received nothing under it.

On the 28th of March, 1877, the plaintiff commenced suit against Fisher and Whiting on the contract for the purchase of the goods. Fisher and Whiting appeared in the action by attorney but did not answer, and made default.

On the 18th of April the plaintiff's attorney served notice of adjustment of costs, but no adjustment was had and no judgment was docketed; and the suit remained in that condition until after this action was commenced. The defendant herein set up that action as a defense, claiming that the plaintiff had elected thereby to affirm the contract; and thereupon the plaintiff, on the 26th of September, 1879, obtained and entered an ex parte order at a special term of the supreme court that the said action be discontinued on payment of defendant's costs. On the same day the plaintiff tendered to the attorney of Fisher and Whiting $10 for their costs in said action, which he declined to accept.

On May 14, 1877, the plaintiff commenced suit against Hersee, in which Fisher and Whiting were named as defendants; but the summons and complaint were served on Hersee alone, and he alone answered. The allegations in the complaint upon which issue was taken and a trial had were, in substance, that the purchase of said goods was fraudulent and that Hersee participated in the fraud. The action was tried and judgment rendered in favor of Hersee, which was affirmed at general term, in June, 1879.

The present action was commenced the 31st of July, 1879. The referee before whom it was tried found among other things that, in the last of said actions above mentioned, the court decided that the purchase by Fisher & Co. was fraudulent but that Hersee was not a party to the fraud; and also found as conclusions of law that by reason of the fraud so found, no title to the property vested in Fisher & Co.; that as the defendant parted with no value for the goods, he acquired no better right to them than was possessed by Fisher & Co.; that defendant's levy was a conversion; that none of the subsequent acts of the plaintiff constituted a waiver of the cause of action herein, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant the value of so much of said property as was levied on by him, with interest.

Mr. G. A. Scroggs, for appellant:

Fraud being a wrong, and quasi criminal, it is never presumed.

To make out a case of fraud, two things must be established: 1. The facts and circumstances on which it is predicated. 2. The fraudulent intent of the person. These are questions of fact, and the onus probandi is on the accusing party.

Allen v. McCrasson, 42 Barb. 662.

Mr. Geo. H. Humphrey, for respondent.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The point is elaborately and ably discussed in the opinion of Smith, P. J., at general term, that the bringing of the action by the plaintiff against Fisher & Whiting, for the contract price of the goods sold to them, was not an election to affirm the contract, which was final and precluded the plaintiff from subsequently bringing this action in disaffirmance of the contract, because the first action was abandoned and discontinued before trial or judgment, and no provisional remedy or other benefit was obtained by the plaintiff therein, nor was the position of the parties changed thereby.

We do not, however, deem it necessary to pass definitely upon that point, for the reason that there appears in the case no finding or request to find that at the time of the bringing of the action on the contract, the plaintiff had knowledge of the fraud which entitled it to rescind the sale. This fact was essential to put the plaintiff to its election of remedies; and it should appear in the findings of fact, to disclose error in the conclusion, that the bringing of the action was not a waiver of the right to disaffirm the contract.

The burden of showing error in the conclusion of the referee is on the appellant; and nothing is better settled than that this court will not, for the purpose of reversing a judgment, look into the evidence to supply a fact not found. It is only for the purpose of affirming a judgment that the court will look at the evidence to supply a fact not specified in the findings.

The mere bringing of the action for the price of the goods, unless it was brought with knowledge of the fraud, was not a binding election, or a waiver of the right to rescind; and no error in the conclusion of the referee is disclosed by the record.

The point made in the dissenting opinion of Baker, J., at general term: that, the finding of the referee that before the commencement of this action the plaintiff demanded of the defendant possession of the goods and the defendant refused to surrender them, is unsupported by the evidence, and is not available to the appellant in this appeal. If the finding was unsupported by any evidence it was an error of law reviewable in this court; but in order to raise the point here, it was necessary that the finding should have been excepted to, and the case contains no such exception.

The other points are fully discussed and, I think, properly disposed of in the prevailing opinion at general term.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

1. An agreement made, on the purchase of rights of way by a railroad corporation, to pay therefor in bonds of the purchasing corporation, is within the powers of such corporation; and the facts that the line of the purchasing corporation was not formally located on the line proposed to be purchased, and was subsequently located on a different line, do not affect the question of corporate power.
2. A contract made by an individual, in connection with others, with a railroad corporation in which he is a director, binding the corporation to purchase certain property from him and his associates, such director having participated in the action of the corporation in assuming the obligation, is within the rule which invalidates all contracts made by a trustee or fiduciary, in which he is personally interested, at the election of the party he represents.
3. Such contract is not rendered valid by the fact that its effect was merely to substitute the corporation for certain of its individual promoters, who had previously contracted for the purchase; nor by the fact that the property consisted of real estate, track, etc., of another railroad corporation which the present vendors had purchased under a mortgage foreclosure; the transaction in question not being an arrangement for the reorganization of an existing railroad within the provisions of Laws 1873, chap. 710.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment in favor of defendant entered upon report of a referee, on the second trial of an action for the specific performance of a contract to deliver railroad bonds. Affirmed.

Reported below, 29 Hun, 76.

The facts and the questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. D. Mills, Geo. T. Spencer, B. W. Huntington, Richard Hand and Samuel Hand, for appellants:

1. The contract in question is not against public policy. The scheme embraced in the contract is such as is expressly authorized by the statutes which permit mortgages of railroad property on foreclosure to become purchasers of and convey the same (Laws of 1857, chap. 444), and the organization of a new company by such purchasers, their assignees and associates.

Laws of 1854, chap. 232, § 1; Laws of 1873, chap. 469, § 1; Laws of 1873, chap. 710, § 1; People v. Brooklyn, P. & C. I. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 75.

It is no legal objection to an agreement, otherwise valid and consistent with an honest purpose, that it may incidentally restrict competition at a public sale.

Atchison v. Mallon, 48 N. Y. 147, 151; Jones v. Caswell 3 Johns. Cas. 38, note; Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 288; People v. Stevens, 71 N. H. 546; Marie v. Garrison, 88 N. Y. 14.

Agreements by which one shall bid for the benefit of himself and one or more parties are not opposed to public policy.

Cases cited above: Bellows v. Russell, 20 N. H. 427; Breslin v. Brown, 24 Ohio St. 565; S. C. 15 Am. Rep. 627; Cornell v. Utica, etc., R. R. Co. 61 How. Pr. 193.

Generally it may be stated that the rule which invalidates contracts upon the ground of preventing or restricting competition at public sales is limited to cases where that is the primary object, and excludes cases where that effect is merely incidental.

Bame v. Drew, 4 Denio, 287; Wicker v. Hoppeck, 6 Wall. 94; (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 752); Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Met. 384; Garrett v. Moss, 20 Ill. 549; *Gibbs v. The law will not presume a contract illegal or against public policy when it is capable of a construction which will make it consistent with the law, and that construction is to be preferred which will support rather than that which will avoid it.

Ormes v. Dauchy, 82 N. Y. 448, 448; Curtis v. Gokey, 68 N. Y. 304; Bigelow v. Benedict, 70 N. Y. 202, 204; Harris v. Tumbidge, 83 N. Y. 92, 99.

A director or other officer of a corporation may lawfully become its creditor; and when such he has all the rights and is entitled to all the remedies of other creditors.

This is a question in which neither the defendants nor the public have any concern. A contract in violation of a fiduciary relation of the party to it is not void; and it is voidable only at the election of the beneficiary.

The Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company became insolvent January 1, 1874; and consequently had continued insolvent nearly eighteen months prior to the date of the contract, and if it was not for all purposes ipso facto dissolved, Munson's fiduciary relations to it were at an end.

Neither stockholders nor creditors had any interest in the mortgaged property to protect. The road was insolvent, the mortgage debts amounting to more than its assets. There could be no fiduciary relations in regard to interests having no existence.

Denike v. N. Y. & R. Lime, etc., Co. 80 N. Y. 599, 608; Hoyle v. Plattsburg & M. R. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 330; Harpending v. Munson, 91 N. Y. 654.

The contract, the assignment of it by Magee, its assumption by the defendant Company, are all admitted by the answer. There is nothing in the complaint showing Munson's relations to the defendant Company. If defendants sought to avoid their contract upon that ground, it was matter of affirmative defense and must have been pleaded.

Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225; Bates v. Rosekrans, 23 How. Pr. 98; approved in Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 370; Wright v. Delafeld, 25 N. Y. 266; Equitable L. Asso. Soc. v. Cuyler, 75 N. Indianapolis B. & W. R. R. Co.* 62 N. Y. 240.

The resolution by which the contract was assumed by the company was unanimously passed at a meeting of the directors; making, without Munson, nine of the whole thirteen. A majority constituted a quorum for the transaction of business; and the decision of a majority duly assembled is valid as a corporate act.

1 R. S. 600 § 6.

Munson's vote was not necessary to the passage of the resolution; and it does not appear that the same in any way influenced its passage.

Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 817; Coleman v. 2d Ave. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 201, 203, 204; Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Credit Mobilier, 135 Mass. 387; Cole v. Boardman, 123 Mass. 548.

The directors, not including Munson, who voted for the resolution by which the contract was assumed, owned more than two thirds of the stock. It is the general rule, sanctioned by the policy of the law, that those who have the largest interest in corporations may control them.

Barnes v. Brown, 80 N. Y. 537; Van Cott v. Van Brunt, 82 N. Y. 540, 541.

The affairs of a railroad corporation must be managed by its board of directors.

General R. R. Law, chap. 140; Laws of 1850, §§ 1-6.

The fact that Munson, subsequent to the making of the contract, became a director and the president of the new company, in no way relieves defendants from their obligations. The question of the legality of a contract is to be determined with reference to the time when it was made.

It will be presumed that the purpose of the contract and that of forming the new corporation was lawful, unless the contrary distinctly appears. No inference that a transaction was illegal can be allowed, unless absolutely necessary.

Contracts preliminary to the formation of a corporation by persons acting in behalf of the corporation to be formed, if legitimate, are binding on the corporation when formed. Such persons are the agents to bring the corporation into existence; the contracts are the means by which this is done; and the formation of the corporation is a ratification of the contracts.

Hawkes v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 15 Eng. L. & Eq. 358; Lindsay v. G. N. R. Co. 19 Eng. L. & Eq. 87; Preston v. Liverpool R. Co. 7 Eng. L. & Eq. 124; Scottish, etc. R. Co. v. Stewart, 3 McQ. 382, 416; Mayor, etc. v. Norfolk R. Co. 30 Eng. L. & Eq. 120; Lorillard v. Clyde, 66 N. Y. 384, 389; Bommer v. Am. Spiral, etc. Co. 81 N. Y. 468, 472, 473; Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 392 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 1050).

Of this character are subscriptions for stock in advance of the formation of a corporation, which become binding as soon as it comes into existence.

II. If the contract of a corporation is such as it had power under any circumstances to make, it must be regarded as made in pursuance of such power; and it cannot be impeached as ultra vires.

The rule that the plea of ultra vires will not prevail whether for or against a corporation, when it will not advance justice but on the contrary will accomplish a legal wrong, is applicable to the present case.

Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62; Woodruff v. Erie R. Co. 93 N. Y. 609; Railway Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 267 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 695); Thompson v. Lambert, 44 Iowa, 236; Hurd v. Green, 17 Hun. 327, 344, 345; Rome Savings Bank v. Kramer, 32 Hun. 270, 276.

There is nothing in the contract by which Magee is required or expected, unlawfully or improperly, to control or influence the proposed Company. The contract contemplates nothing more in this respect than the uniform and ordinary exercise of the legitimate powers of the Company for a legitimate purpose.

Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; Legrand v. M. M. Assn. 80 N. Y. 638.

III. The action is properly brought for a specific performance. The object of the contract was to procure the bonds of the new company to be organized, as an investment. A recovery of money would be no adequate equivalent for the bonds; and judgment for damages could not be collected against the Corporation, which is deeply involved.

IV. The conveyance by the referee in the foreclosure suit, and that tendered by Munson to defendants, cover all the title, estate, rights and interests which were in contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.

The contract is to be interpreted and applied to the subject matter, by reference to the circumstances and situation of the parties at the time it was made.

The referee's deed to Munson and his to the defendant Company conveyed all the property, rights of way, franchises and interests which were provided for by the contract.

Riggs v. Pursell, 66 N. Y. 193; White v. Seaver, 25 Barb. 285; Tompkins v. Hyatt, 28 N. Y. 347.

The rule that a purchaser on foreclosure sale may require a perfect title has no application to a case where he purchases only a limited interest that is apparent, either from the mortgage or otherwise.

A railroad mortgage executed at the inception of the undertaking, or to procure funds for the construction of the road, is intended only to cover titles and rights as they are procured; and as they are procured they become subject to the mortgage. Titles are necessarily incomplete during the process of construction.

V. The plaintiffs' right of action did not depend upon their ability at all times to perform, unless at least the defendants were ready. In actions for specific performance of contracts for purchase of land it is sufficient if vendor is able to make title at the time of the decree. The tender of a deed is not a condition precedent.

Welles v. Smith, 7 Paige, 22; Pierce v. Nichols, 1 Paige, 244; Brown v. Huff, 5 Paige, 235; Reformed Protestant Dutch Ch. v. Mott, 7 Paige, 77; Viele v. Troy & B. R. R. Co. 21 Barb. 381; affd. in 20 N. Y. 184.

The defendants can take no advantage of the plaintiffs' delay, unless they have shown themselves ready; of which there is no proof, in the finding of the referee or otherwise.

Merchants Bank v. Thomson, 55 N. Y. 7, 12, 13.

When no certain time is fixed for performance, the party from whom performance is due is not in default until he has been notified or required to perform by the other party; and until some act or notice on the part of the latter indicating the contrary, he must be regarded as consenting to the delay.

The defendants, not having given plaintiffs notice that performance was required at any particular time, or objected to delay, cannot now set up delay as an excuse for nonperformance on their part.

Leslie v. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 33; Meyer v. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 516.

By the whole course of conduct of defendants, and especially the action of the directors of defendant Company, when the deed was tendered by Munson and the bonds demanded, omitting as they did to make objection, on the ground of delay or otherwise, they waived such objection.

Wiswall v. McGowan, 1 Hoffman, Ch. 125, 139; Fry, Spec. Perf. pp. 308, 324, §§ 703, 745, 746 (Am. ed. pp. 409, 428, 429); Lawrence v. Dale, 3 Johns. Ch. 23; McKay v. Carrington, 1 McLean, 50; More v. Smedburg, 8 Paige, 600, 607.

If the defendants intended to repudiate their contract, upon the ground of delay, they ought so to have advised plaintiffs before the foreclosure sale, so that they need not to have been at the expense of the purchase. By their silence on this point when they ought to have spoken, they are estopped from alleging delay as a ground of defense.

VI. To constitute a novation of the contract which would have the effect of releasing Magee, there must have been an express agreement of plaintiffs to accept the new obligation in satisfaction of the old.

The defenses of ultra vires, offense against public policy, and incapacity of Munson to contract, are not available to Magee. The contract was valid between him and plaintiffs; it was not impossible to perform; it was not against public policy for Magee to perform it; nor did the fiduciary relations of Munson to the defendant Company exist at the time of the contract.

Kirschman v. Lediard, 61 Barb. 573.

In the absence of proof of any agreement of plaintiffs to release Magee, the presumption is that his liability continued.

Meridan Britannia Co. v. Zinsgen, 48 N. Y. 247.

As in the common case of the agreement of the purchaser of property to pay the debt of the vendor as the consideration of the purchase, the original debtor is not discharged unless by the express agreement of the creditor upon sufficient consideration. The assumption of a mortgage by the grantee of the mortgagor is an illustration.

It is admitted and substantially found by the referee that a large amount of the bonds of the defendant Company have been issued and delivered to Magee. These bonds, being in his hands with notice, are chargeable with the equities of plaintiffs.

IV. The inadequacy of the consideration in this case, that is, the difference between the real value of the property which could be conveyed by the deed tendered and the value of defendants' bonds which plaintiffs ask to have adjudged to them herein, is so great as to render the contract sued on a hard and unconscionable one, and one therefore which a court of equity will not specifically enforce, as such enforcement would produce injustice.

V. Should the court do anything in the way of specifically enforcing said contract in question, it could or would of course merely and fully carry out the intention of the parties to it. Story, Eq. Jur. § 791.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think it would be difficult to affirm the judgment of the court below, dismissing the complaint, if in order to do so it was necessary to uphold the proposition that the original contract of August 13, 1875, between the plaintiffs and Magee, was invalid either because Munson, one of the plaintiffs, was, at the time of entering into the contract, a director of the Sodus Bay and Corning Railroad Company, or for the reason that the contract violated the rule which prohibits combinations to prevent competition at a judicial or other public sale.

The situation was briefly this: the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company was organized in 1871, to construct and operate a railroad from Corning in the County of Steuben, to Sodus Bay, in the County of Wayne, a distance of about eighty-six miles, passing through the Counties of Schuyler, Yates and Ontario, by way of Savona, Penn Yan and Geneva. Of this road the plaintiff Munson was president and a director.

In 1872 the corporation created a mortgage on its projected road, its franchises and property, for $1,500,000, to secure a contemplated issue of bonds to that amount, to be used in the construction of the road. It proceeded to secure rights of way over a portion of its line, graded about thirty miles of its track between Savona and Geneva; and expended in the aggregate, in securing titles and in the prosecution of the work, the sum of $250,000. It issued bonds under the mortgage to the amount of $257,000, from the proceeds of which the expenditures were made.

At the date of the contract between the plaintiffs and Magee, August 13, 1875, the plaintiffs held and controlled of the bonds $241,000 in amount, the remaining $16,000 being in the hands of a former treasurer of the company, whose title thereto seems to have been disputed, but who subsequently received a dividend thereon from the proceeds of the mortgage sale.

The title of the plaintiffs to the $241,000 of bonds was not questioned; and there is no suggestion that they were not bona fide holders for value, or that the bonds did not represent a valid debt against the company for their full amount.

In January, 1874, the company became insolvent. It defaulted in the payment of the interest on its bonds at that date; and in the spring of 1875 all operations on the road were suspended, and the further prosecution of the enterprise was practically abandoned. In short, when the contract of August 13, 1875, was made, the company was hopelessly bankrupt; the work had stopped; the interest on its bonds had been unpaid for eighteen months, and practically its whole property consisted of disconnected rights of way over a portion of its route, and a road bed partially graded between Savona and Geneva; and whatever property it had N. Y.

of any value was acquired through the means furnished by the holders of the bonds.

Under these circumstances the parties entered into the contract of August 13, 1875. It recites that the plaintiffs own and represent $241,000 of the bonds of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, and that Magee, the other party to the contract, represents the persons and interests proposing to organize another railroad company for the construction of a railroad from the vicinity of Corning to Geneva.

The parties of the first part (the plaintiffs) agree to proceed at once to secure the foreclosure of the mortgage, and purchase on the foreclosure sale the property, rights of way, franchises and interests covered thereby; and convey the same to Magee or to the railroad company proposed to be organized. Magee, the other party to the contract, agrees to deliver or cause to be delivered to Munson and his associates, in payment for the said property, rights of way and franchises, first mortgage bonds of the proposed railway company to the amount of 50 per cent of the principal and interest of the bonds of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, held by them. The contract contains other stipulations not now necessary to mention.

In the view we take of another question in the case, we deem it unnecessary to determine whether the contract of August 13, 1875, was valid as between the original parties thereto; that is, whether the plaintiff Munson, in entering into the contract, violated any duty owing by him to the corporation of which he was a director, or whether the contract as a whole was, on the part of Munson and his associates, anything more than a legitimate arrangement to protect their interests as bondholders, and to make the mortgage security available for the payment of a part of the mortgage debt.

The contract was not by or with the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company; and assuming that the question as to the validity of the original contract can be raised in this action, we are not prepared without further consideration to condemn the transaction on either of the grounds suggested. Duncomb v. N. Y. H. & N. R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 190; Marie v. Garrison, 88 N. Y. 14; Harpending v. Munson, 91 N. Y. 650.

But this action is not brought to enforce the contract of August 13, 1875, against the defendant Magee. It is an action to compel the specific performance by the defendant Corporation, of the undertaking of Magee in that contract, to deliver the bonds of the new company as therein provided, founded upon the assumption by the new company of that obligation, by resolution of its board of directors, passed August 13, 1875; and also upon the subsequent contract of September 14, 1875, made between the company and the plaintiffs, which in its primary provision substituted the company in the place of Magee as the party of the second part in the contract of August 13, 1875.

The action in its entire scope is framed to enforce the obligation of the defendant Corporation, under its contract of assumption. It was tried upon this theory, the exceptions point to this as the ground of the action, and Magee is joined as defendant and in the demand of relief, as the custodian of bonds of the company which the plaintiffs claimed he should be adjudged to deliver to them, by the judgment in the action.

Throughout the trial the action was treated as an action against the defendant Corporation, upon its contract; and in no respect as an action against Magee, to enforce a liability against him under the contract of August 18, 1875. The plaintiffs, therefore, are compelled to meet the question whether upon principles of equity they are entitled to the aid of the court to enforce an executory contract between themselves on the one side, and the defendant Corporation on the other, for the sale of the property of the former, in a case where one of the plaintiffs at the time the contract was made was a director of the purchasing Corporation and took part in making the contract upon which the action is brought.

For a proper understanding of the situation, a few additional facts need to be stated:

On the 26th of August, 1875, Magee and his associates organized a railroad company, to construct a railroad from Corning to Geneva, as contemplated by the contract of August 18, 1875. The plaintiff Munson was one of the promoters, and became a director and stockholder, and was the first president of the corporation.

On the 31st of August, 1875, Magee executed a written assignment to the new corporation, the Syracuse, Geneva & Corning Railway Company, of his rights under the contract with the plaintiffs of August 18, 1875; and the board of directors at a meeting on the same day, in which the plaintiff Munson participated, passed a resolution assuming the contract on the part of Magee, and agreeing to perform it, except in one particular not now material to be mentioned.

On the 14th of September, 1875, the contract before referred to of that date was entered into between the plaintiffs and the new corporation, and was executed individually by each of the plaintiffs, and on the part of the corporation, by the plaintiff Munson, as president. The proceedings of the board of directors indicate that when the resolution of August 31, 1875, was passed, and for two or three months thereafter, the company contemplated building its road to Geneva on the same line substantially as that of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, but in December, 1875, it located an entirely new line, not coincident in any part with the line originally contemplated, upon which new line its road was subsequently built. It is found, and the evidence supports the finding, that the best interests of the Company were promoted by adopting its present route.

The plaintiffs procured a foreclosure of the mortgage and purchased the property as they had agreed; and subsequently in 1877, tendered a deed thereof to the defendant Corporation, and demanded the delivery of the bonds, which was refused.

In determining the legal question presented, it is proper to say that there is no evidence of any actual fraud or collusion on the part of any of the parties to the original contract of August 18, 1875, or that the contract of assumption was induced by any improper appliances or motives whatever.

It is plain that Magee and his associates, when they entered into the original contract, contemplated building the proposed road on the line of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, and that the contract was made with a view of acquiring for the new road, the rights of way, and other property of that corporation. It is equally plain that the contract of assumption was entered into by the new corporation with the same expectation, and for the same purpose.

If the contract was otherwise unobjectionable, it could not, we think, be assailed upon the ground that it was a contract outside of the power of the defendant Corporation. The statute authorizes a railroad corporation to acquire land for its track and other necessary purposes, by voluntary purchase or by condemnation (Laws 1850, Chap. 140, §§ 14, 15); and an agreement made on the purchase of rights of way, to pay therefor in bonds of the purchasing corporation, secured by a mortgage on its property, is clearly, we think, within the implied, if not within the express powers of a railroad corporation. § 28, subd. 10.

The contract made between the defendant Corporation and the plaintiffs was, in substance, a contract to purchase rights of way, and although the defendants' line was not formally located on the line proposed to be purchased, and was in fact subsequently located on a different line, this change of purpose does not, we think, affect the question of corporate power.

But we are of opinion that the contract of September 14, 1875, is repugnant to the great rule of law which invalidates all contracts made by a trustee or fiduciary, in which he is personally interested, at the election of the party he represents.

There is no controversy as to the facts bringing the case as to Munson within the operation of the rule.

He and his associates were dealing with a corporation in which Munson was a director; in a manner where the interests of the contracting parties were or might be in conflict. The contract bound the corporation to purchase; and Munson, as one of the directors, participated in the action of the corporation, in assuming the obligation and in binding itself to pay the price primarily agreed upon between the plaintiffs and Magee. He stood in the attitude of selling as owner and purchasing as trustee.

The law permits no one to act in such inconsistent relations. It does not stop to inquire whether the contract or transaction was fair or unfair. It stops the inquiry when the relation is disclosed, and sets aside the transaction or refuses to enforce it, at the instance of the party whom the fiduciary undertook to represent, without undertaking to deal with the question of abstract justice in the particular case. It prevents frauds by making them, as far as may be, impossible, knowing that real motives often elude the most searching inquiry; and it leaves neither to judge nor jury the right to determine, upon a consideration of its advantages or disadvantages, whether a contract made under such circumstances shall stand or fall. It can make no difference in the application of the rule in this case that Munson's associates were not themselves disabled from contracting with the corporation, or that Munson was only one of ten directors who voted in favor of the contract.

The contract on its face notified Munson's associates of his relation to the corporation, and that the contract was subject to be defeated on that ground; and on the other hand a corporation in order to defeat a contract entered into by directors, in which one or more of them had a private interest, is not bound to show that the influence of the director or directors having the private interest determined the action of the board.

The law cannot accurately measure the influence of a trustee with his associates; nor will it enter into the inquiry, in an action by the trustee in his private capacity, to enforce the contract in the making of which he participated. The value of the rule of equity to which we have adverted lies to a great extent in its stubbornness and inflexibility. Its rigidity gives it one of its chief uses as a preventive or discouraging influence, because it weakens the temptation to dishonesty or unfair dealing on the part of the trustees, by vitiating, without attempt at discrimination, all transactions in which they assume the dual character of principal and representative.

The rule has been declared and enforced in a great variety of cases, but in none perhaps with more vigor and completeness, both upon principle and authority, than in the leading case of Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252.

But the case of the Aberdeen R. Co. v. Blaikie, 2 Eq. 1281 [S. C. 1 McQ. 461], decided by the House of Lords, is in many of its features similar to the present one. In that case it appeared that the plaintiffs were a manufacturing firm, and that one of them was also a manager of the Aberdeen Railway Company, the defendant, and the chairman of the board. At a meeting of the managers, they by resolution authorized their engineer to contract for iron chairs needed by the company. The agent contracted with the plaintiff's firm. It did not appear that the member of the firm who was also a manager and the chairman of the company, intermeddled with the dealing on either side, further than that it may be assumed he was at the meeting which authorized the engineer to procure a supply of chairs. The plaintiffs brought their suit to enforce specifically the performance of the contract, or in the alternative to recover damages for its nonperformance. After a decision in their favor in the lower court, the company appealed to the House of Lords, where the ruling was unanimously reversed, upon the ground that the contract was condemned by the rules of equity, as having been made between the company of which one of the plaintiffs was a manager, and a private firm of which he was a member. The opinions of Lord Chancellor Cranworth and of Lord Brougham vindicate, upon impregnable grounds, the general rule and its application to the particular case.

We have designedly omitted, up to this time, special reference to a circumstance which it is claimed takes the case out of the operation of the general equitable rule. That is, that the contract with the defendant Corporation was not on the part of the plaintiffs a fresh dealing in respect to the sale of their interest in the property of the Sodus Bay and Corning Railroad Company; but was simply a substitution, in the place of Magee, of the Corporation organized by him and his associates, for the purpose of carrying out the original arrangement.

N. Y.

But the promoters of a corporation are not the corporation. The legal body is distinct from the individuals who compose it. The statute confers no authority upon the promoters of a corporation to enter into preliminary contracts, binding the corporation when it shall come into existence. Such contracts may bind the individuals who make them. If adopted by the corporation, and they are within the corporate powers, and are not otherwise subject to objection, they may become the contracts of the corporation and enforceable as such.

In respect to contracts of promoters, Judge Redfield says: "The promoters are in no sense identical with the corporation; nor do they represent it in any relation of agency; and their contracts could of course only bind the company so far as they should be subsequently adopted by it, as their successors." 1 Redf. R. R. *9.

But the corporation is at liberty to refuse to sanction them, and if its sanction is obtained by the act or co-operation of directors who have a private interest, we perceive no reason why, under the general rule, the corporation may not resist an action for specific performance, at least in a case where it has not accepted the consideration and taken the benefit.

It is claimed that the general policy of the law in this State, sanctions the contract in question, and we are referred to chapter 710, Laws of 1878, which authorizes the purchaser, or the grantee of the purchaser of the real estate, tracks and fixtures of a railroad corporation, sold under a mortgage or decree, to associate with him other persons and form a new corporation to maintain and operate the road.

But the transaction in question was not in any proper sense an arrangement for the reorganization of an existing railroad. It was not contemplated that the new corporation should operate or maintain the road of the old corporation. The line of the new corporation, by its articles, extended only from Corning to Geneva; whereas, the route of the old corporation was from Corning to Sodus Bay.

When the contract was made, the enterprise of building the Sodus Bay & Corning Road had been commenced, but the road had not been built. Its route had only in part been located, and the great burden and expense of the undertaking was yet to be incurred. The case is not in terms within the Act of 1878, nor, as we think, within its spirit and intent.

These views lead to an affirmance of the judgment.

PEOPLE of State of New York, Respts.,

ROME, WATERTOWN & OGDENSBURG
R. R. CO., Appl.

1. To maintain a peremptory writ of mandamus, issued on the application of the Attorney-General in the name of the People of the State, it must appear from the undisputed facts alleged that it was issued to protect some public right or to secure some public interest.
2. Assuming that, when a town has been bonded for the construction of a rail- road upon condition that a permanent depot should be erected and maintained at a specified point within the town, a contract is created between the town and the railroad company, such contract can only be enforced by some proceeding on behalf of the town; it is not a matter of public interest in such sense that it can be enforced by mandamus on the application of the Attorney-General on behalf of the People of the State.

3. If a contract obligation arises between a railroad company and a town bonded for its construction, for the maintenance of a depot, such obligation does not pass by the foreclosure of a mortgage on such railroad; nor does it devolve upon the successors of such company.
4. The decisions of the state board of railroad commissioners are advisory, merely; and no legal right can be based thereon in a proceeding for a mandamus to compel a railroad company to comply with the recommendation of the board.
5. A railroad company owned two lines of track to a certain village; it discontinued running trains upon the more direct line, which it had acquired by consolidation with another company, but ran trains upon the other line, which required the residents of said village to travel about two miles farther than by the more direct line, and to change cars at a different point. It appeared that the company maintained service between the termini of the road acquired by consolidation, and substantially performed its duties to the public at large. Held, that the facts did not warrant the issuance of peremptory mandamus, upon the application of the Attorney-General, to compel the company to run trains upon the more direct line.
6. Where a railroad company owns, by consolidation, two lines of road, and can substantially accommodate the People of the State by operating one line between the same points, and can abandon the other line without any serious detriment to any considerable number of people, it should not be compelled by mandamus to operate both lines at a great sacrifice of money.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming an order of the Jefferson Special Term, awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 38 Hun. 640.

Statement by Earl, J.:

The Attorney-General applied to the special term of the supreme court for a peremptory writ of mandamus, and the following are the material facts alleged in his petition:

That the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company is a railroad corporation organized under the laws of this State and was engaged in the operation of a railroad from Rome, Oneida County, to Watertown, Jefferson County, and to points north on the St. Lawrence River, passing through the Town of Sandy Creek, and having a station at Washingtonville; that in February, 1868, the Syracuse Northern Railroad Company was incorporated, under the General Railroad Act, to construct, and it subsequently did construct, a railroad from Syracuse to the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad at Washingtonville and there formed a junction with that road; that prior to such construction a map locating the line and termini of the road was duly adopted by the board of directors and filed as provided by law, covering the location of its line and northern terminus as subsequently constructed; that there was also a railroad from Oswego connecting with the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad at Richland, upon which road there was a station called Pulaski Station, about four miles westwardly from Richland; that the Syracuse Northern Railroad also passed through Pulaski Station and thence about one mile to Pulaski Village where it had a station, and thence about five miles in a northerly direction to Sandy Creek Village, where there was a station; and thence about a mile to Washingtonville Station; that while that road was thus operated the travel from Washingtonville Station southerly to Syracuse was through the Villages of Sandy Creek and Pulaski to Pulaski Station and thence southerly; that before that road was constructed the Town of Sandy Creek, under statutory authority, subscribed for $80,000 of the stock of that company and paid therefor in the bonds of the town issued for that amount; that the statutory consent for the bonding of the town was upon the express condition that the railroad should be constructed through the Town of Sandy Creek and a permanent depot erected at Sandy Creek Village; that a mortgage was given upon that road in 1873, and that mortgage was subsequently foreclosed and the railroad and its franchises were purchased by an individual; that subsequently, in September, 1875, a reorganization of the road was effected under "an Act to facilitate the reorganization of railroads sold under foreclosure, and providing for the formation of new companies," passed April 11, 1874, and a new company under the name of the Syracuse & Northern Railroad Company was organized which was vested with all the rights, privileges and franchises which at the time of the foreclosure sale belonged to or were vested in the Syracuse & Northern Railroad Company; that subsequently the Syracuse & Northern Railroad became consolidated with the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad, under chapter 917 of the Laws of 1869; and the latter Company took possession and assumed control of the road; and until September 5, 1877, operated the same from Syracuse to and through the Villages of Pulaski and Sandy Creek to Washingtonville; that the consolidation agreement recited that the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company owned and operated a railroad from Rome to Ogdensburg, and leased a road from Oswego to Richland Junction; that the Syracuse & Northern Railroad Company owned and operated a railroad from Syracuse to a connection with the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad at Wash-

ingtonville, and that thus the railroads formed a continuous line of railroad between the City of Syracuse and the points and places to which the railroads of the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company did and were authorized to extend; that soon after the defendant ceased to operate that portion of the Syracuse & Northern Road lying between the Oswego branch of the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad at Pulaski Station and Washingtonville, and removed the track on that section of the road, as well as the station houses at the Villages of Pulaski and Sandy Creek; that since that time such abandonment has continued and still exists; that the junction formerly maintained at Washingtonville has been changed, with its attendant local advantages, to Richland; that such abandonment was and continued to be a matter of serious damage to the People of the State of New York, and especially to that portion of the People of this State who were residents and taxpayers of the Town of Sandy Creek, their property and business interests; and compelling them, when desirous of traveling to the Village of Pulaski and the City of Syracuse, to adopt a circuitous route "involving more or less change of cars, transfer and delay," for which they have no remedy for damages at law; that by chapter 353 of the Laws of 1882, the Legislature enacted that there should be created in this State, in the manner and form therein referred to, a board of railroad commissioners, with certain powers and duties therein mentioned; that in pursuance of the provisions of that Act, complaint in due form (of the abandonment and proceedings above stated) was made against the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company, to which complaint the Company filed an answer; that a hearing was had thereon before the board; and after due deliberation it, on the 21st day of April, 1884, adjudged and determined as follows:

"The judgment of the board is that the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company had no right or authority to abandon the portion of the Syracuse Northern road in question, and that in so doing it has violated the laws of the State, and has neglected and now neglects to comply with the terms of chapter 140 of the Laws of 1850, and its amendments, under which the Syracuse Northern Railroad was created, that in so doing and in running its trains via Richland Junction, it usurps authority conferred by no Act or law of this State. The board hereby notifies the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company of said violation, neglect and usurpation, and recommends that said Company proceed, within a reasonable time, to and do rebuild, restore and operate said abandoned portion of its road, hereinbefore particularly described."

A copy of the determination of the board was thereafter served upon the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company, but that it failed to comply with the recommendation of the board, and that thereafter, on or about the 15th day of November, 1884, the board of railroad commissioners transmitted, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act of 1882, to the Attorney-General, a copy of the proceedings and its determination in the above matter.

The application for the mandamus was opposed by the defendant upon an affidavit of its general manager, in which he denied that the alleged abandonment by it of a portion of its former line "has been or continues to be a matter of serious damage to the People of the State of New York, and especially to that portion of the People of the State who are residents and taxpayers of the Town of Sandy Creek, their property and business interests," and stated that, on the contrary the present lines operated by the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company furnished greatly increased facilities to the People of the State of New York, as well as to the People of the Town of Sandy Creek, above those which were enjoyed by that community at any time prior to the last two years; that it is now far more convenient for the people of the Town of Sandy Creek to reach their principal markets, the Cities of Oswego, Syracuse, Watertown and Rome, than at any previous time, by means of the lines of the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company; that a far greater number of trains, both passenger and freight, are now run than were run before the alleged abandonment, and that it is an absolute fact that the passenger and freight service between the Village of Sandy Creek and the Cities of Oswego, Syracuse, Watertown and Rome is far more convenient, prompt and efficient than before said abandonment; that it would cost about $70,000 to restore the abandoned track, and that the annual expense of maintaining and operating that portion of the road would be about $15,000 without any addition whatever to the income of the defendant; that the defendant was engaged in a steady and determined effort to make its road in all respects a serviceable agent of the People of the State of New York and of all the people who have occasion to use its facilities; and that if the restoration were now ordered or compelled by the courts of the State it would result in diminishing the efficiency of the road for all the People of the State, including the people of the Town of Sandy Creek.

It further appears from the papers presented to the court that since the abandonment complained of, passengers and freight going southerly from Washingtonville are carried to Richland Station, thence to Pulaski Station, and thence on to Syracuse; and that passengers and freight from Syracuse are carried to Pulaski Station, thence to Richland and thence to Washingtonville; that the passenger cars on the Syracuse & Northern Railroad all stop at and depart from Richland Station, and that thus the passengers are required to change cars at that station, and that the increased distance from Washingtonville to Pulaski Station by way of Richland Station is about two miles.

Upon the presentation of these facts, the judge at special term granted a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the defendant to proceed to restore the abandoned portion of said road from the point where said track of the Syracuse Northern Railroad intersects the Oswego branch at Pulaski, through the Villages of Pulaski and Sandy Creek to the Washingtonville Station, so-called, on the line of the Rome, Watertown & Ogdensburg Railroad Company's road upon the route where said road was formerly operated at the time when said road was abandoned, and to rebuild, restore and operate said portions of such road, and to open and operate said road and route, by running trains over the same at regular intervals for the accomodation of the public in the transportation of passengers and property."

From the order granting the writ, the defendant appealed to the general term, and from affirmance there to this court.

A peremptory writ of mandamus may be issued in the first instance, when the right depends only on questions of law, and notice has been given to the corporation.

The State has no other remedy than mandamus, unless an action to annul the charter of the corporation; and that remedy ought not to be elected, because it only destroys functions where the public interests require their continued existence and enforcement.

People v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. R. Co. 28 Hun, 554.

Neither does it impair the remedy by mandamus that a remedy for damages is given to the party aggrieved. If such an action was given in this case by statute, it would not be exclusive unless declared by the statute; and it would not be inconsistent with the remedy by mandamus.

Wood, Mandamus, pp. 56, 111, 114, 115; Add. Torts, p. 1486.

There cannot be any question in this proceeding that the State has been guilty of laches in instituting the application against the Company. The damage has been a continuing one. The usurpation of the corporate powers constitutes a continuing cause of action to the People.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In his petition, the Attorney-General prayed for a peremptory writ of mandamus, and one was awarded. Such a writ is authorized only "where the applicant's right to a mandamus depends only upon questions of law." Code, § 2070.

In determining whether this writ was properly issued, therefore, we must consider only such facts alleged in the petition as were not denied or put in issue, and the affirmative allegations of the affidavit presented on the part of the defendant in opposition to the application for the writ. Where the material allegations of the application for a writ are put in issue, or where the answering affidavits contain allegations showing that a peremptory writ ought not to be issued, the court should award an alternative mandamus in the first instance, in order that the issue of fact may be regularly tried before the proper tribunal.

As this writ was applied for by the Attorney-General on behalf of the People, it must be assumed that it was issued only to subserve a public interest and to protect a public right. If private interests only were involved the application for the writ by the Attorney-General on behalf of the People was not proper. In that case, it should have been applied for by the private parties interested, who should have been relators. In order therefore to maintain this writ and to justify the action of the court in granting it, we must be able to see from the undisputed facts alleged that it was issued to protect some public right or to secure some public interest.

It matters not that the Town of Sandy Creek was bonded for the construction of the Syracuse Northern Railroad, upon condition that a permanent depot should be erected and maintained at the Village of Sandy Creek. If it be assumed that the bonding proceedings created a contract between the town and the Railroad Company, that contract is not one which could be enforced by this writ of mandamus, issued on behalf of the People. The contract right and obligation are not in any proper sense a public matter in which the People of the State in their sovereign capacity are interested. If there is a valid contract still in force and operative, it must be enforced by some proceeding taken on behalf of the town; and cannot be enforced by a proceeding instituted by the Attorney-General on behalf of the People of the State.

But the performance of the contract, if there was a valid one, never devolved upon the defendant. The contract obligation was not a charge or lien upon the property of the Syracuse Northern Railroad Company, and remained where the unsecured obligations of the company rested after the foreclosure of the mortgage given by it. It did not pass by the foreclosure sale to, or devolve upon its successors, the Syracuse & Northern Railroad Company and the Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg Railroad Company.

In a case where the court had a discretion to grant or withhold the writ of mandamus, the circumstances attending the bonding of the Town of Sandy Creek could well have been considered in determining that discretion.

Under the Act, chapter 353 of the Laws of 1882, by which the board of railroad commissioners was constituted, the decision of that board has no binding or conclusive authority. No such effect is given to the decisions of that board, by any of the provisions contained in the Act. Its decision in this case was merely advisory and recommendatory; and the defendant was at liberty to obey or disobey it. It was a sufficient justification, however, for the application by the Attorney-General for the writ of mandamus; and if the court had had a discretion to withhold or grant the writ, it might properly have had some influence in the exercise of that discretion. But no legal right in this proceeding can be based thereon.

We are left, therefore, to determine simply whether upon the facts which we must assume to exist in this case, the defendant ought in the public interest, as an absolute duty, to be compelled to rebuild, maintain and operate the small section of road which it abandoned. We have not here the question which would have to be determined if the Syracuse Northern Railroad Company was still in existence and had abandoned the portion of its road between Pulaski Station and Washingtonville Station, so that passengers and freight were carried only to and from the former station. But we have a case where the defendant has succeeded to all the rights and obligations of that railroad company; and the question is whether it is discharging the duty to the public imposed upon it by the consolidation of that railroad company with it.

After the consolidation it had two lines from Pulaski Station to Washingtonville; a direct line about seven miles long; and a circuitous line by way of Richland about two miles longer. It was not absolutely bound in law to stop any of its trains at the Village of Pulaski or the Village of Sandy Creek. It would have discharged its whole duty by running its trains through from the Pulaski Station to the Washingtonville Station without stopping. It would cost it more than $15,000 annually to maintain and operate its direct road from Pulaski Station to Washingtonville Station without adding one dollar to its income. It could accommodate every passenger and every pound of freight at Washingtonville Station or at the Pulaski Station, by carrying it over a line which it owned, by way of Richland.

Did it not thus substantially perform the duty which devolved upon it as the successor of the Syracuse Northern Railroad Company? It carried all passengers and freight from Washingtonville to Pulaski Station and Syracuse; and all passengers and freight from Syracuse and Pulaski Station to the terminus of the Syracuse Northern Railroad at Washingtonville. How can it be said that it owed a duty to the public to do this over the direct line, rather than over a line near by, but two miles longer?

There is no allegation that any considerable number of people are discommoded; and it does not appear that a single person suffers any harm, except that passengers are obliged to change cars at Richland rather than at Washingtonville Station; and persons taking the cars at Washingtonville Station to go south, are obliged to travel about two miles farther.

But we must take the facts as stated in the affidavits of the defendant's manager, read in opposition to the application for the writ: that it is not true that the abandonment of this small section of road has been and continues to be a matter of serious damage to the People of the State of New York, or especially to that portion of the People of the State who are residents and taxpayers of the Town of Sandy Creek; but that the present line operated by the defendant between Washingtonville Station and Pulaski Station furnishes greatly increased facilities to the People of the State of New York as well as to the people of the Town of Sandy Creek, above those which were enjoyed at the time of the abandonment; that it is now far more convenient for the people of that town to reach their principal markets, the Cities of Oswego, Watertown, Syracuse and Rome, than at any previous time, and that their railroad service is altogether more efficient and convenient than it was previous to the time of the abandonment.

Under such circumstances we see no reason for saying that the interests of the People have suffered from this abandonment, or that any considerable number of the People of this State were thereby in any way injured or inconvenienced. If a few individuals were discommoded, or private interests were in any way injured, this writ is not the proper remedy for such evils.

We have with great care examined and considered the numerous authorities cited on behalf of the people in support of this writ; but we find none which justify it. Several cases were cited in which it was held that a railroad company could be compelled by mandamus to operate its railroad to the terminus specified in its charter. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Henning, 17 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 266; State v. Hartford & N. H. R. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538; Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 843 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 423]; King v. Severn & Wye R. Co. 2 Barn. & Ald. 646; People v. Albany & Vt. R. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 261.

But the principles of those cases are not controlling in this, because here the railroad service is kept up between the termini of the Syracuse Northern Railroad; and the public duty which devolved upon it at its organization is fully and substantially performed by the defendant.

The present line is a little longer than the one originally adopted, and slightly varying therefrom, but it accommodates the People of the State and the people of the locality, substantially as well as the line originally adopted. Suppose two roads were consolidated and the lines of the two between two places were parallel and near to each other; could the consolidated road be compelled by mandamus to operate both lines, or could it discharge its duty to the public by using only one line?

Suppose the New York Central and the West Shore roads, as their lines approach the City of Buffalo were parallel to and near each other; could not the New York Central, which is now substantially the owner of both roads, abandon the West Shore line, and run into the City of Buffalo upon the New York Central line?

We do not determine that in all cases where a railroad company which by consolidation has become the owner of two lines of roads between two termini, and running through different sections of country and different cities or villages, like the two lines between Syracuse and Rochester, could abandon either of its lines; because in such cases it might well be that the public interests and the accommodation of a large portion of the People of the State required that both lines should be operated; but where a railroad company owns by consolidation two lines of road and can substantially accommodate the People of the State by operating one line between the same points, and can abandon the other line without any serious detriment to any considerable number of people, we do not believe that it should be compelled by mandamus to operate both lines at a great sacrifice of money, upon the fanciful idea that the sovereignty of the State is wounded by its omission to operate both lines.

The defendant does not run its cars at any point where it has not the right to; and it does not exercise any franchise which it is not authorized to. It accommodates all the travel and traffic which the Syracuse & Northern Railroad Company was required to accommodate. That road still has a connection with the defendant, and all the travel and traffic over it can still commence and terminate at Washingtonville. There is no public right to protect and no public duty to enforce by mandamus.

We are therefore of opinion that the orders of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and the application for a peremptory writ of mandamus denied, with costs.

1. When a boat becomes entangled with a bridge, without fault on the part of the bridge owner, and becomes a nuisance which the bridge owner has a right to remove, in exercising that right the bridge owner must use ordinary care to do no unnecessary injury to the boat, and will be liable for injury unnecessarily inflicted.
2. In such a case the bridge owner is not liable for want of skill in the persons engaged in the removal of the boat, but only for the omission or commission of some act which an ordinarily prudent man would not have committed or omitted, and for reckless conduct on their part.
3. If the bridge owner wrongfully pulled down a span of the bridge upon the boat in extricating it, nothing less than want of ordinary care on the part of the boat owner to protect the boat by relieving it of the burden would absolve the bridge owner from liability for the damage which ensued.
4. If, as matter of fact, the boat owner could, with the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have removed the debris which fell upon the boat in its being extricated from the bridge, and saved the boat from subsequent injuries, the bridge owner was not liable for such injuries.
5. Where the evidence clearly shows some substantial damages to which a plaintiff is entitled if the issue as to negligence is decided in his favor, the failure to distinguish as to all items between damages of that character and those to which the plaintiff is not entitled does not necessarily confine plaintiff's recovery to mere nominal damages.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Albany Circuit Court in favor of plaintiffs. Affirmed. Memorandum of decision below, 26 Hun, 391. The action was brought to recover damages for injury done to a ferry boat belonging to the plaintiffs, by the servants and agents of defendant, whilst removing it from against and under the defendant's bridge at Albany, against which it had been carried at a time of high water and freshet.

The defendant in its answer set up a counterclaim for damages done to the bridge by the collision of the boat with it. The plaintiffs replied, denying the allegations of the answer constituting a counterclaim.

The evidence shows that on April 8, 1872, the plaintiffs were the owners of the boat George Mark, and were running her upon a ferry between Troy and West Troy; that the ice in the river had broken up some three or four days before, and the river had been practically clear of ice for that length of time, except for an hour or so on the afternoon of the 8th; that this ferry boat had been running safely during all that time, and many other boats had been running during the same time; that this boat had been making trips every fifteen minutes during that time, except for an hour or two Monday afternoon; that she was staunch, strong and in good order, as also was her machinery; and that she had on board a crew of competent men, and on that trip an extra hand; that she had a competent pilot, engineer and fireman; that on the trip immediately preceding the one in question, the river was free of ice, and only a few scattered cakes could be seen as she started on her last trip.

She started on her last trip on said April 8, 1872, at about 9:45 P. M., and ran into a heavy body of ice when she had got half or three quarters of the way across the river. She was carried by this body of ice down the river to Albany, dragging her anchor part of the way and finally parting her hawser; and at about 1 o'clock A. M., she brought up against the bridge of defendant, and caught upon the lower north chord of the bridge by about six inches of the upper part of her gallow's frame, which holds the walking beam; the ice dammed up behind the boat for a considerable distance up the river; the collision broke the lower north chord of the bridge, pulled the timbers of the upper north chord open and broke two or three sticks in the lower south chord; it also broke the upper works of the boat.

Mark, plaintiffs' superintendent, came to Albany as soon as he could after he heard that the boat had gone down, and arrived at about 2 o'clock A. M.; went at once to examine the situation of the boat and, thinking that nothing could be done to relieve the boat or bridge before daylight, left her. At daylight he again went to the boat and found Tanner, the foreman of defendant, on board the boat with a gang of seven to fifteen men with axes, etc., trying to disconnect the upper works of the boat so as to let it pass under the bridge.

The defendant's men, under the direction of Tanner, undertook to depress the boat with jackscrews; in the meantime, Mark had gone to Troy to get help, having no means of removing the boat at Albany, and to consult with his co-owners, and left word at West Troy to have all his men come down. While Mark was gone the defendant's men had got some of the ice away by the use of tugs, at the same time using the jackscrews; while doing this the boat started and passed under the north chord and down to the south chord, where she caught as she had caught upon the north chord; at that time Tanner, defendant's foreman, deciding that the bridge must come down caused two tugs to be hitched to the ferry boat and with them tried to pull the boat from under the bridge; failing with the two, he caused another boat to be hitched on, and the three succeeded in pulling the span off of the east abutment down upon the boat, smashing the joiner work, upper cabins and machinery. Mark returning at about that time requested Tanner to let his boats draw the span of the bridge up stream and not let the ferry boat sink; Tanner replied "We are now going to dinner and will attend to it afterwards."

The defendant's men then went to dinner, leaving the span on the boat, and the boat in a sinking condition, and in a couple of hours she sank; that afternoon, Mark procured a ferry boat to hitch on to her to draw her into the basin but it was unable to do so; and during the next night she was carried down to the lower end of the city, where she grounded upon a sand bar. The plaintiffs caused the boat to be raised, the machinery to be taken out and repaired, and the boat herself lengthened and repaired.

The action was commenced April 21, 1873, and has been tried three times. The first trial took place in January, 1878. The jury rendered a verdict on that trial in favor of the plaintiffs, for $15,068.16. A motion was thereupon made upon the minutes, by the defendant, for a new trial; and the motion was granted, upon the ground that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of the defendant's liability for the damages which occurred from the bridge being allowed to remain upon the boat after its fall.

The order granting a new trial was appealed from and was affirmed by the general term, upon the ground upon which it was granted. The case was again tried in January, 1881, before the same justice, who charged the jury that the case had not been substantially changed from its presentation on the former trial; and that the plaintiffs, upon the evidence, were not entitled to recover anything, upon account of damages occurring after the fall of the bridge upon the boat; and under that charge the jury found a verdict for only $7,000.

From the judgment entered on that verdict both parties appealed and the general term affirmed the judgment upon the defendant's appeal, but reversed it upon the appeal of the plaintiffs, upon the ground, solely, of error in refusing to permit the jury to find for the plaintiffs for any part of the damage occurring after the fall of the bridge.

The case was tried for the third time in the month of January; 1884, before the same judge; and in accordance with the decision of the general term the court submitted to the jury fully the question of the defendant's liability for the damages occurring after the fall of the bridge, and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, for $15,000, upon which judgment was entered; from the affirmance of which this appeal is taken.

The questions raised are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Matthew Hale, for appellant:

Negligence may consist either in the careless performance of obligations assumed, or in neglecting to undertake the performance of obligations imposed by law.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 4.

Where the proximate cause of the damage is the plaintiff's own supineness or carelessness, he has no ground of action against the defendant, even though the primary and original cause of the damage be the defendant's wrongful act.

1 Add. Torts, 24.

"Proximate" does not mean next or near, in order of time, but near in order of causation; and although all events which are next in the latter order are usually next in the former, they are not always so.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 10, 38.

It is not necessary that the plaintiff's negligence should directly contribute to the injury; if it proximately (that is, in the order of causation) so contributes, there can be no recovery.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 33; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Goss, 17 Wis. 428.

The burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs, as well upon the question of damages as upon that of negligence; and if they had failed to show what damages resulted from the alleged negligent acts of defendant, and to distinguish them from damages for which defendant was not responsible, they could recover only nominal damages.

See Leeds v. Metropolitan Gas-Light Co. 90 N. Y. 26.

The defendant was not liable in this action, unless there was gross negligence on the part of its servants in the removal of the boat. The existence of degrees of negligence is well settled; and the distinction between such degrees has been the basis of great numbers of decisions, from the leading cases of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, down to the present time.

Alexander v. Greene, 7 Hill, 533, 546, 560, 574; Bowen v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 408; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 16-18; Oleghorn v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 56 N. Y. 44; First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Bank, 60 N. Y. 278; Pattison v. Syracuse Nat. Bank, 80 N. Y. 82.

If one does an act of pure favor for another, with the assent of the latter, his responsibility to him is reduced to the duty of merely slight care and diligence.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 22; Spooner v. Mattoon, 40 Vt. 800.

Messrs. Isaac Lawson and R. A. Parmenter, for respondents:

Anyone who sustains a special injury from a public nuisance, to an extent that will support an action at law, may abate the same of his own motion, doing no more damage than is necessary to protect his rights and prevent a recurrence of damage from the nuisance.

Wood, Nuis. § 730.

A man has no right to abate any more of a nuisance than is necessary to secure his rights.

Wood, Nuis. p. 764; Cooper v. Marshall, 1 Burr. 260; Rez v. Papineau, 1 Str. 686; Harrower v. Ritson, 37 Barb. 301; State v. Kernan, 5 R. I. 497.

A private nuisance injuring a private right may be abated by the person injured, to the extent necessary to secure a reasonable enjoyment of the right injured; any excess of abatement becomes a trespass pro tanto; every man is his own judge, and he judges at his peril.
x. y.

Wood, Nuis. pp. 767-769.

If a party in abating a nuisance does more injury to another than was necessary to effect the legitimate object, he is liable to an action.

Gates v. Blinco, 2 Dana, 158; Dyer v. Depuis, 5 Whart. 584; Wright v. Moore, 38 Ala. 594; Moffett v. Brewer, 1 Ia. 348; Perry v. Fitzhow, 8 Ad. & El. 757; Indianapolis v. Miller, 27 Ind. 398; Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257; Hicks v. Dorn, 42 N. Y. 47. See also Babcock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268.

A plaintiff may recover notwithstanding his own negligence exposed him to the risk of injury, if the defendant, after becoming aware of the plaintiff's danger, failed to use ordinary care to avoid injuring him.

Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 573; 2 C. B. N. S. 740; Davies v. Mann, 10 Mees. & W. 546; 3 Ohio St. 172; 4 Ind. 94; 43 Mo. 380; 38 Ala. 76; 9 Allen, 557; 3 Allen, 176.

The burden of proof was clearly upon the defendant, in case the jury should find that the defendant was guilty of negligence in pulling the span upon the boat, both upon the question of the plaintiff's negligence in failing to remove the span, and upon the question as to the amount of damages caused by the failure to remove it.

Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 371; Hamilton v. McPherson, 28 N. Y. 77; Costigan v. Mohavek & H. R. R. Co. 2 Denio, 609; DeBenedetti v. Manchin, 1 Hilt. 213; Thomas v. Kenyon, 1 Daly, 132.

Under such circumstances, the law does not require strict proof of the exact amount of damages apportionable to each party.

Parkenheimer v. Van Order, 20 Barb. 479; Van Steenberg v. Tobias, 17 Wend. 562; Auchmuty v. Ham, 1 Denio, 495.

The jury might have found that the damage from the pulling down of the bridge was caused by gross negligence or willfully; and in that case if the amount of damage sustained could not have been accurately determined, the wrongdoer must bear the burden of such difficulty.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 594; Leeds v. Amherst, 20 Beav. 239.

Whether gross negligence is known to and defined in the law is seriously doubted.

See Perkins v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 206, 207; Smith v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 241; The New World v. King, 16 How. 474 (57 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 1021); Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 646-661; Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113.

But if such a degree of negligence is known to and defined in the law, it is defined to be and is "the want of even slight care and diligence."

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 18; Story, Bail. § 17. Or it is the want of that care which every man of common sense, howsoever inattentive, takes of his own property.

Edwards, Bailm. p. 44.

The plaintiffs were only bound to the exercise of reasonable care, skill and diligence, and were not bound to incur any hazard or assume unusual risks to obviate the consequences of defendant's acts.

v. McPherson, 28 N. Y. 76, 77; Berier v. Del. & Hud. Canal Co. 13 Hun, 259; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 29, 31, 32, 34, 598 and notes.

The cost of repairs, the loss of the use of the boat, and interest, furnished the proper measure of damages.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first point made by the appellant on this appeal is that the trial court erred in refusing to direct the jury that the plaintiffs, upon the evidence in the case, were not entitled to any recovery against the defendant.

The injury done to the plaintiffs' boat by coming in contact with the defendant's bridge was not shown to have been occasioned by any fault of the defendant; and whether it was owing to any fault on the part of the plaintiffs was, upon the evidence, a fair question for the jury. That question was material, however, only with respect to the defendant's counterclaim, for if as claimed by the plaintiffs, after the boat had become entangled in the bridge the method adopted by Tanner, the superintendent of the Bridge Company, for extricating it, was reckless and displayed a want of ordinary care, and caused unnecessary injury to the boat, the defendant was liable for the unnecessary injury, even if the plaintiff was in fault in getting its boat in that position.

Although the defendant was not to blame for the situation in which the boat was placed, and it became a nuisance which the defendant had a right for its own protection to remove, yet in exercising that right it was its duty to use ordinary care to do no unnecessary injury to the boat. Hicks v. Dorn, 42 N. Y. 47.

It was claimed on the part of the plaintiffs that the act of Tanner in causing the boat to be pulled by main force through the bridge so as to break it and pull the span of the bridge down upon the boat was a reckless act, evincing a want of ordinary care and prudence, whereby unnecessary injury was done to the boat as well as to the bridge. This charge, if substantiated, was sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the damage thus unnecessarily inflicted. There was evidence sufficient to authorize the submission of the question to the jury; and consequently the court committed no error in refusing to charge the jury that the plaintiffs, upon the evidence in the case, were not entitled to any recovery against the defendant.

The claim that the uncontradicted evidence in the case showed that Tanner and the men working under him, in attempting to effect the removal of the boat from under the bridge, were acting at the request or with the consent of the plaintiffs is not sustained by a reference to the testimony. The trial judge charged the jury distinctly that if Tanner and his men proceeded to remove the boat, either upon the request of George Mark (who represented the plaintiffs) or with his consent expressly or impliedly given by a failure to object to their proceedings, the defendant was not liable; that the men who did the work, although generally in the employ of the defendant, became for that service the servants of the plaintiffs, and for their conduct the defendant was not responsible.

Without recapitulating the testimony, we think that upon the evidence it was a fair question for the jury whether Tanner and his men were acting at the request of Mark and as his agents or in the exercise of the right of the defendant to free the bridge from the obstruction, and in its service. The verdict necessarily determined that question in favor of the plaintiffs.

Exception was taken to the refusal of the judge to charge the jury, at the defendant's request, that the defendant was not liable in this action unless there was gross negligence on the part of its servants in the removal of the boat.

It is true that the judge declined, in his instructions to the jury, to use the term "gross negligence" in explaining to them the degree of negligence necessary, under the circumstances of the case, to render the defendant liable. But without using that term he charged them very fully upon the point, and described to them in his own language what kind of negligence was necessary to charge them with damage. He charged that the boat being against the bridge, so as to impede and obstruct its use, and being there without any fault on the part of the defendant, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to remove it at the earliest possible moment and to be extraordinarily diligent in that removal; that if they failed in that duty the defendant had the right to remove the boat; that in that removal the defendant was not bound to use the highest skill; that it was not bound to have skilled workmen and the best appliances to meet the emergency; that it was only bound to have ordinarily careful men in its employ, and such appliances as the statute creating the Company required it to have; and that to render the defendant liable they must find that the injury was caused by such acts of carelessness and negligence as ordinarily careful and prudent men, intent on doing their work properly, would not have committed or failed to perform; that if they found that the defendant's servants were not doing the work at the request of the plaintiffs but in the service of the defendant, they were to determine whether or not the boat was so carelessly and recklessly removed that the careless and reckless removal caused the injury.

It was several times repeated throughout the charge that the defendant was not liable for want of skill in the persons engaged in the removal of the boat, but only for the commission or omission of some act which an ordinarily prudent man would not have committed or omitted, and for reckless conduct on their part.

We think that this was a sufficient definition of the degree of negligence necessary to be shown, and was probably more intelligible to the jury than would have been the term "gross negligence." As said by Allen, J., in First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 295, the term is incapable of precise definition. It depends very much upon the circumstances to which the term is to be applied. It has been most frequently used in cases where a gratuitous bailee has been sought to be made liable for loss or damage of property intrusted to him, the general rule being that a gratuitous bailee is liable only for gross negligence. In such cases the term has been defined to mean the want of that ordinary diligence and care which a usually prudent man takes of his own property of the like description. Gibbin v. McMullen, L. R. 2 P. C. Cases, 327.

In other cases it is said that a gratuitous bailee is held only to that degree of diligence which a person of common sense, not a specialist or expert in any particular department should exercise in such department; and sometimes it is defined as the want even of slight care or such as even a habitually careless person would take. 2 Whart. Neg. § 470.

In 2 Kent, Com. 560, gross neglect is defined to be the want of that care which every man of common sense, under the circumstances, takes of his own property; citing Jones, Bailm. 118, and Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 913.

In many cases the term itself has been condemned as incapable of being usefully applied in practice and incapable of being accurately defined. Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 650; Austin v. Manchester, etc. R. Co. 11 Eng. Law & Eq. 513; The New World v. King, 16 How. 474 [57 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 1021]; Storer v. Gowen, 18 Maine. 177; Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & Welsb. 113.

It seems to us that the jury were correctly instructed as to the rule of liability in this case, and that under the circumstances the exercise of such ordinary prudence as would be expected, even of unskilled persons, was not too stringent a requirement, in view of the serious consequences liable to ensue from a reckless performance of the work in which the defendant's servants were engaged.

In Hicks v. Dorn, 42 N. Y. 47, where a boat had become an obstruction in the canal, it was held that it was the duty of the superintendent to remove it, and that he had no right, even if it had become a nuisance, to destroy it unless such destruction was necessary, and that the question was whether the defendant discharged his duty as a reasonable, prudent and careful man.

According to the testimony of the plaintiffs, Tanner was warned that by attempting to force the boat through he would bring down the bridge; but that, nevertheless, after having failed with two tugs to get her through, while her gallows frame was in contact with the south chord of the span, he obtained a third boat and with the united power of the three broke through, bringing the span of the bridge down upon the boat and crushing her joinder work, upper cabins and machinery.

The verdict established that this damage was caused by the acts of Tanner and his assistants; and that these acts were such as even unskilled men of ordinary prudence would not have committed, but were reckless. A cause of action was thus made out.

But further questions are raised which affect the amount of the recovery. There was great conflict in the evidence as to what was done after the span of the bridge had been brought down upon the boat. The defendant contends that it removed the debris and made the boat fast to the wharf; and that she afterwards drifted away and sank; and that it is not liable for the damages accruing after the falling of the span; while according to the plaintiff's testimony the defendant took no measures to remove the span but left it on the boat; and she was sunk thereby, and in the night drifted down the river.

The court charged the jury that if the facts were as claimed by the defendant it was not responsible for the subsequent damages but only for those which flowed directly from the fall of the bridge; but that if the span was permitted to rest upon the boat until it sank by the weight of the structure and then drifted down the stream, the plaintiffs could recover for the subsequently accruing damages, provided that they themselves, by the use of ordinary diligence, could not have relieved the boat.

The only exception, taken on the part of the defendant to this portion of the charge, related to the degree of diligence which the plaintiffs were bound to exercise for the purpose of freeing the boat from the span of the bridge after it had fallen upon the boat; defendant claiming that the plaintiffs were bound to use extraordinary diligence for that purpose and the court holding that they were bound to use ordinary care and attention in protecting their property.

It seems to us that if the jury found that the defendant had wrongfully pulled the span of the bridge down upon the boat, nothing less than want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiffs to protect their boat, by relieving it of the burden, would absolve the defendant from liability for the damage which ensued.

The court was requested by the defendant to charge with reference to this point that the plaintiffs could not recover for any damages done to the boat, after a portion of the bridge was pulled upon her, for the reason that such damage, on the uncontradicted evidence in the case, might have been prevented by the plaintiffs.

After the first trial of this case the trial judge so held, on a motion for a new trial; and the general term affirmed this holding. It was mainly based on the testimony of the plaintiff Mark. Upon a new trial this ruling was adhered to and a verdict was rendered for those damages only which accrued from the fall of the span, and before the sinking of the boat. On appeal by the plaintiffs to the general term, the judgment entered on that verdict was reversed and a new trial ordered, upon the ground that on the second trial Mark had so modified his testimony given on the first trial, as to raise an issue of fact as to whether he could have relieved the boat of the fallen span; and on the third trial, which is the one now under review, his testimony was such as, in our judgment required the submission of that question to the jury, and it was accordingly submitted to them, with the instruction that if they found that Mark could, with the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have removed the debris from the boat and saved her from the subsequent injuries, the defendant was not liable therefor.

We think this branch of the case was properly disposed of by the court. It appears that after the boat had sunk, she was raised at considerable expense and all her injuries repaired, as well those arising from her original collision with the bridge as those accruing afterwards; and she was also lengthened beyond her original length, and much time was consumed in all these operations, they having extended over 200 days, during which period the plaintiffs lost the use of their boat, the value of which was proved to be $40 per day. The gross amount of the expenditures was shown. The expense of repairing the injuries from the collision, and the expense of lengthening the boat, was excluded. The jury were, under the charge, left at liberty to allow interest on the damages; and this seems, by the defendant's request to charge, to have been assented to by it.

The defendant requested the court to charge that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs, as well upon the question of damages as upon the question of negligence; and that if plaintiffs had failed to show what damages resulted from the alleged negligent acts of the defendant, and to distinguish them from damages for which defendant was not responsible, they could recover only nominal damages.

The court refused to charge this request, and we think properly. It was too broad. The first part of the proposition was undoubtedly correct, but the testimony clearly showed some substantial damages to which the plaintiffs were unquestionably entitled, if the issues as to negligence were decided in their favor; and the failure to distinguish as to all the items between damages of that character and those to which the plaintiffs were not entitled could not be visited on the plaintiffs, under the circumstances, by confining their recovery to mere nominal damages.

The same remark is applicable to the exception to the refusal of the judge to charge that there was no evidence in the case from which the jury could determine how long the plaintiffs were deprived of the use of their boat, by reason of any negligence of the defendant; and that therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover any damages for the supposed loss of the use of the boat. If the request had been to charge that the jury could only allow such damages, either for expense of repairs or loss of time, as were affirmatively shown by the evidence to have been caused by the acts for which the defendant was responsible, a different proposition would have been presented.

It is very evident from the verdict that the jury must have distinguished between the damages for which the defendant was responsible and those which were attributable to the misfortune of the plaintiffs in getting their boat into the perilous position in which she was. According to the testimony the total expense of the raising of the vessel, and of the repairs, was from $9,700 to $9,800; and the total loss of time, 200 days, which at $40 per day amounted to $8,000.

These two items, with interest to the time of the trial, would have amounted to nearly $80,000; and all that was specifically shown to be included therein for damages, for which the defendant was not responsible was $2,400 for lengthening the boat and about $900 for repairs of damages caused by the collision with the bridge, and some small items.

It is obvious from the amount of the verdict that the jury did not proceed upon the theory of charging to the defendant in the first instance the total loss, and then deducting the items for which the defendant was shown not to be responsible, thus shifting the burden of proof. They were not instructed by the court to pursue that course.

After examining the numerous other exceptions in the case we are of opinion that there is none which requires a reversal of the judgment; and it should therefore be affirmed, with costs.

An action seeking to make a trustee of a manufacturing corporation personally liable for a debt of the corporation, on the ground of failure to make the annual report required by statute, is an action for a penalty; and therefore, under sections 523 and 837 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the verification of the answer therein may be omitted.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEALS from orders of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming orders of Special Term denying motions to compel plaintiffs to accept unverified answers in actions seeking to make a trustee of a manufacturing corporation personally liable for a debt of the corporation. Reversed.

Reported below, 33 Hun, 548.

Mr. James B. Dill, for appellant.

Messrs. Wilmot & Gage, for respondents.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 523 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the verification of an answer may be omitted (where not otherwise expressly prescribed) where the party pleading would be privileged from testifying as a witness, concerning an allegation or denial contained in the pleading.

Section 837 declares that a witness shall not be required to give an answer which will tend to expose him to a penalty or forfeiture.

This action is brought against the defendant, to recover a debt due by a manufacturing corporation of which he was a trustee; and he is sought to be made liable therefor, upon the ground that he failed to make the annual report required by the General Manufacturing Law. The action is not to recover a debt which he owes, but to impose upon him, as a penalty for his default, the payment of the debt of the corporation.

We have repeatedly held that such an action is an action for a penalty or forfeiture. Any admission which he might make in his answer, in support of the plaintiff's allegations, would therefore necessarily tend to expose him to a penalty. Merchants Bank v. Bliss, 35 N. Y. 412;

Veeder v. Baker, 83 N.Y. 156; Stokes v. Stickney, 96 N. Y. 826.

The liability sought to be enforced against the defendant does not arise out of any contract obligation, but is imposed by the statute as a penalty for disobedience of its requirement.

The distinction between the nature of this liability and that of stockholders under the same statute is clearly pointed out in Wiles v. Suydam, 64 N. Y. 173; Veeder v. Baker, 83 N. Y. 155-160.

This action is not founded upon any debt owing by the defendant. The debts owing by the company are made the measure of the penalty.

The orders should be reversed and the motions granted, with costs in the court below and one bill of costs in this court.

v.

Eliza ANDREWS, Appt.

1. A dedication of land to the public can not be inferred from the mere removal of a fence, by the owner.
2. Commissioners of highways are confined to the procedure prescribed by statute, for the removal of obstructions to a highway; and cannot maintain a suit in equity to compel the removal of such an obstruction or to enjoin future obstructions.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Dutchess Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to prevent the reclaiming of land alleged to be dedicated to public use as a highway. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 81 Hun, 173.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William D. Guthrie and Alexander Harvey, for appellant:

To constitute a highway by dedication, it is essential not only that there shall exist an explicit and absolute intention on the part of the owner of the land to permanently set apart and surrender it to the public use; but also that such dedication shall be accepted by the proper public authorities; or that the highway so dedicated shall have been actually used by the public.

Holdane v. Cold Spring, 21 N. Y. 474; Niagara Falls Susp. Bridge Co. v. Bachman, 66 N. Y. 261, 269, and cases there cited.

The mere act of setting back defendant's fence, in order to improve the appearance of her property, and substituting a row of trees therefor, is not the deliberate, unequivocal and decisive act referred to in the authorities.

Gowen v. Phila. Exchange Co. 5 Watts & S. 141, 144.

In Davis v. Clinton City, 58 Iowa, 389, it appeared that the owner of land adjoining a road agreed to recognize it as of a certain greater width than was actually used; and it was held that such agreement would not constitute a dedication of the adjoining land to the public.

See also Mansur v. State, 60 Ind. 357; Harding v. Town of Hale, 61 Ill. 192, 200.

Aside from the question of intent to dedicate, it was equally essential in this case to establish user by the public, in the absence of any acceptance by the proper authorities. Moreover, the user in such case ought to be for such a length of time that the public accommodation and private rights might be affected by a revocation.

McMannis v. Butler, 51 Barb. 436, 449; Cincinnati v. Lessee of White, 6 Pet. 431, 439 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 452, 456).

If a dedication be conceded, still it was revocable by the defendant.

Holdane v. Cold Spring, supra; McCarthy v. Whalen, 87 N. Y. 143, 151.

The plaintiffs as Commissioners of Highways had no legal power to accept the dedication of a highway or any part thereof, except in the manner particularly prescribed by law.

The powers, duties and functions of commissioners of highways in this State are expressly defined by statute.

People v. Bd. of Supervisors, 93 N. Y. 397, 401; Rochester v. Town of Rush, 80 N. Y. 302, 311.

They are virtually state officers, discharging duties imposed for general public purposes for the benefit of the whole community.

People v. Town Auditors, 74 N. Y. 310, 315.

The alleged widening of this road was evidently an alteration of it.

People v. McNeil, 2 Thomp. & C. 140.

The only authority the plaintiffs had as public officers to thus alter the road was either with the consent of the owner in writing, or by the special proceeding prescribed in chapter 465, Laws of 1877.

The plaintiffs as Commissioners of Highways had no power to commence a suit in equity; and therefore had no cause of action in the premises. The people of the State by the Attorney-General alone could sue to abate such a nuisance.

Coykendall v. Durkee, 13 Hun, 260, 262; Putnam v. Valentine, 5 Ohio, 187.

Mr. H. H. Hustis, for respondents.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think there is nothing in the record to show that the strip of land in question was not left open for the pleasure or convenience of the owner, rather than the accommodation of the public; but, assuming the act of the owner to be equivocal and consistent with a dedication to the public, it is plain there has been no acceptance on its part, nor such actual user as might take its place.

The plaintiffs do not aver acceptance, and the only one of them who testifies states that he never heard of any dedication of the land. The Act relied upon as an act of dedication, is the setting back of her fence by the defendant, and placing trees on the old line. The alleged user is for a highway with her knowledge and consent. We are referred to no evidence of this and find none.

An owner of land cannot, by the mere removal of his fence, impose upon the public a strip of land as a street; nor can the public deprive the owner of any right or interest in or control over it by that circumstance. Here there was nothing more. There was neither an actual gift by the owner of the land, nor a user by the public; no evidence by word, or by any decisive act, of an intent even to give or dedicate; and the motion to dismiss the complaint should have been granted.

We are also of opinion that the action is misconceived. It is in equity; and the only relief sought is that the defendant be compelled to remove so much of her fence as she has already restored to its former position and be restrained by injunction from replacing the rest. The plaintiffs sue as Commissioners of Highways. The statute has defined their duty and vested them with power to execute it.

Upon the plaintiffs' theory the defendant has obstructed the highway. The statute prescribes the method of procedure on their part. That she threatens still further to obstruct it can give them no cause of action. If she executes the threat, they have in a proper case the power of summary removal of the fence at her expense; but if the encroachment be denied, the issue must go before a jury. 1 R. S. title 1, pt. 1, chap. 16, art. 5, as amended by Laws of 1878, chap. 245; Coykendall v. Durkee, 18 Hun, 260.

The plaintiffs can have no other remedy by this action; and it is needless therefore to grant a new trial.

The judgment is reversed and the complaint dismissed, with costs.

1. The failure of an executor to pay over the amount found against him on judicial settlement, a decree requiring payment, service of decree, and an ineffectual attempt to enforce the decree by execution, make out a case of contempt, punishable by the surrogate, under section 2555 of the Code of Civil Procedure.
2. The surrogate is not necessarily concluded by the uncorroborated affidavit of the executor alleging his inability to comply with the decree; and as the decision of the surrogate imposing punishment for the contempt involves conflicting evidence and the exercise of discretion, it will not be reviewed by the court of appeals, where the discretion has not been unfairly exercised.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming an order of the Surrogate's Court of Rensselaer County, adjudging an executor guilty of contempt, etc. Appeal dismissed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 302.

The appellant was executor of the estate of Jabez Olmstead, deceased. The order appealed from adjudged him to be in contempt for refusing and neglecting to pay over certain sums of money as directed by a decree made upon the settlement of his accounts as executor, and imposing, as his punishment, a fine equal to the amount found due from him, and committing him to the county jail until the same should be paid.

The facts connected with the questions presented are further stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Lansing, for appellant:

Not every case of failure to obey a surrogate's decree, directing an executor to distribute funds with which he stands charged, is punishable as a contempt under section 2555 of the Code.

Baucus v. Stover, 89 N. Y. 1.

The decree in this case states a specific fact, to wit: that the conversion of the fund occurred before the passage of section 2555, which withdraws the case from the operation of the statute, and protects the appellant from punishment thereunder.

The general rule is that the character and consequences of particular acts are to be determined by the law which was in force when the acts were done.

Sanford v. Bennett, 24 N. Y. 20; Code, § 3352.

In other words, statutes must be construed prospectively only, unless the intention of the Legislature to make them retrospective in their operation is very clearly and unequivocally expressed.

People v. Supervisors of Columbia Co. 43 N. Y. 130; People v. McCall, 94 N. Y. 587.

There is no provision of the Code giving section 2555 a retrospective application and we insist that it should not be so applied, especially since it is in its nature and remedy quasi criminal and highly penal, so that such construction would have the effect of an ex post facto law.

There cannot be a refusal or willful neglect to pay money unless the recusant has it.

Redf. Surv. Pr. p. 755.

The former law (8 R. S. 5th ed. p. 204) empowered the surrogate to enforce all lawful orders, process and decrees of his court, by attachment against the person of those who should neglect or refuse to comply with such orders and decrees, or to execute such process, which attachment should be in form similar to that used by the court of chancery in analogous cases.

2 R. S. 221, § 6, subd. 4; Watson v. Nelson, 69 N. Y. 536.

Among the principal adjudications upon this statute were Estate of John Sherry, 7 Abb. N. C. 890, in which Surrogate Calvin held that an attachment could not be issued unless it be shown that the executor had the fund in hand at the time of the decree.

See also People v. Concles, 3 Abb. Ap. Dec. 507, in which case the fund had been found to be actually in the hands of the executor.

Also Timpson's Estate, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 230, decided in 1872, as explained in People v. Marshall 7 Abb. N. C. 380, in both which cases it appeared that the executor had the fund in his hands sufficient to pay the decree at the time it was made.

See also the case of Doran v. Dempsey, 1 Bradf. 490, in which it was held that unless the executor willfully retains the assets in his hands, or refuses to pay when he has the means to do so, an attachment will not be issued.

This doctrine is cited with approval in Matter of Latson, 1 Duer, 696.

A remedy, ample in its provisions, is given by statute, applicable to exactly this class of cases.

Laws 1877, chap. 208.

Mr. J. A. Cipperly, for respondents:

Where, as in this case, the delinquent is an executor, and the decree relates to the fund or estate, it may be enforced by punishing him with or without issuing an execution, as the surrogate thinks proper.

Code, § 2555, subd. 4.

This provision of the Code applies to all proceedings after September 1, 1880, and gives the surrogate power to enforce his decree by proceedings for contempt.

Code § 3347, subd. 11; Matter of Dissoway, 91 N. Y. 235; Woodhouse v. Woodhouse, 5 Redf. 131; Joel v. Ritterman, 5 Redf. 136; Redf. Surr. Pr. 754 and notes, also p. 755; Abb. Ann. Dig. 1882-3, p. 85.

Section 2550 of the Code provides that the final determination of the rights of the parties to a special proceeding in the surrogate's court is styled indifferently a final order or decree.

The proceeding by order to show cause, made on the 9th day of May, 1883, was a special proceeding to which the Code is specially applicable.

Matter of Dissoway, 91 N. Y. 235.

The surrogate's court is a court of record.

Code, § 2, subd. 20.

It has the same power to punish for contempt as a court of record, and to require an executor, etc., to perform any duty imposed upon him by statute, or by the surrogate's court, under authority of a statute.

Code, § 2481.

The decree directing payment by the executor, except upon an appeal therefrom, is conclusive evidence that there are sufficient assets in his hands to satisfy the sum which the decree directs him to pay.

Code, § 2552.

A surrogate's decree directing the payment of money may be enforced by punishment as for a contempt of court.

Code, § 2555.

Inability to perform the duty, if resulting from the act or omission of defendant himself, is not a defense.

7 Abb. Dig. 398 and cases cited. Timpson's Estate, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 230; People v. Bergen, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 97; 53 N. Y. 404; Joel v. Ritterman, 5 Redf. 136; Gillies v. Kreuder, 1 Dem. 349; Redf. Surr. Pr. 755 and cases cited.

The provisions of the Code, § 2555, giving the surrogate power in certain cases to enforce decrees for the payment of money, is similar to the provision of section 1241 of the Code, which gives the supreme court power to enforce judgments in certain cases by punishing for contempt of court. The exercise of such power is in the discretion of the court to which application is made; and that discretion, when exercised is not reviewable on appeal.

N. Y.

Cochranes v. Ingersoll, 78 N. Y. 613; Mount v. Mitchell, 31 N. Y. 356.

The decree of final settlement of March 29, 1882, directing the payment of this money by the executor is a determination by the surrogate; and is conclusive evidence that there are sufficient assets in the executor's hands to satisfy the sum which the decree directs him to pay, such decree not having been appealed from.

Code, § 2552 and cases cited above. Gillies v. Kreuder, 1 Dem. 349.

Redfield in his Surrogate's Practice, p. 755, says: "If one, who is directed to pay a sum of money, claims and admits that he cannot pay, for the reason that he has appropriated to his own use trust funds, which would otherwise have been applicable, his neglecting to pay under such circumstances is a willful neglect and punishable as a contempt."

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The receipt of money by the executor in his official capacity, a judicial accounting, showing a balance against him of $2,975.70, followed by a decree requiring payment to those entitled to it, and an ineffectual attempt to enforce the decree by execution, are conceded facts.

Upon a petition stating these things, and alleging that after demand made, the executor neglected and refused, "and now willfully neglects to obey the decree," he was, by order of the Surrogate of Rensselaer County, required to show cause why he should not be punished for his alleged offense and contempt.

In answer thereto, he made two affidavits, the averments of which the Surrogate held insufficient; and, imposing a fine to the extent of moneys unpaid by him, ordered that the executor be imprisoned in the common jail of the county, until the fine and the costs of the proceeding were paid.

The general term has affirmed the order in face of the dissent of one of its number. I do not understand that any member of the court doubted the jurisdiction or power of the Surrogate to make the order appealed from; but, in view of the alleged insolvency of the executor and of his declaration of inability to pay, thought he ought not to be punished for not paying.

The contempt charged was in violating the decree or order which directed payment; and the investigation before the Surrogate might properly have been limited to the matter contained in it; i. e., the service of the decree and the facts of the neglect constituting its violation. To those matters there was no answer. The truth of them was admitted, and the case clearly brought within the provision of section 2555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which the Surrogate made the order in question.

The argument of the learned counsel for the appellant is placed upon the particular words of the affidavits of the executor. In effect they assert an early conversion of the trust funds to the exigency of his private and individual business; next the transfer of his business and his stock in trade and real estate to his wife, upon no present consideration, but in application upon an old debt, and followed by no apparent change in possession or management; then, in consequence of this transaction, insolvency and inability to comply with the decree.

The learned judge at general term has sufficiently pointed out that the Surrogate was not necessarily concluded by these bald and uncorroborated assertions of the defaulting executor; and as the question is not only one to be determined upon evidence, at least conflicting, but also rests in discretion which has not been unfairly exercised, we find no ground on which we can review his decision. Code, § 1837; Cochrane's Exr. v. Ingersoll, 78 N. Y. 618.

The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

CROSS appeals from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, modifying and affirming as modified a judgment of the Kings County Special Term. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 33 Hun, 665.

This action was brought by plaintiff against his copartners, composing the firm of Fleming, Kennedy & Co., the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and the persons composing the firm of Payson, Canda & Co. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that in March, 1872, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company entered into a contract with Payson, Canda & Co. for the construction of a part of its railroad, at certain specified prices for the respective classes of work required; that thereafter Payson, Canda & Co. sublet the grading of said portion of the road to plaintiff's firm; that plaintiff's firm performed the work undertaken by them in a proper manner; that the estimates of said work made by the chief engineer of the railroad company, as provided in the contract and subcontract, were incorrect and grossly partial to the company, and underestimated the work done by plaintiff's firm; that Payson, Canda & Co., knowing these facts and acting in collusion with plaintiff's copartners, procured from the latter, against plaintiff's consent and after notice from him to the contrary, a relinquishment of the claim of plaintiff's firm, for the amount actually due them for the work done by them, and consummated a settlement with his copartners, upon the basis of said erroneous estimates; that at the time of said transactions, by articles duly executed by his copartners, plaintiff was exclusively authorized and empowered to make any and all settlements and to give any and all acquittances for any moneys, claims or demands due or to become due upon the said work or contract therefor; and that plaintiff is interested in the copartnership to the extent of one quarter.

Plaintiff demanded judgment for a decree declaring that the pretended settlement made by his copartners and Payson, Canda & Co. be set aside as null and void; that all estimates made by the chief engineer of the railroad company of work under the subcontract to his firm be vacated and set aside; that an accounting be had of the work performed by his firm as subcontractors, and the value thereof; that plaintiff's firm recover of Payson, Canda & Co., and of the railroad company, any damages suffered by it in being compelled to employ unnecessary laborers, and from neglect and omission to make estimates, together with the amount due for work done by plaintiff's firm, deducting payments made on account before the pretended settlement; that if any of the defendant members of plaintiff's firm, Fleming, Kennedy & Co., shall be found to have released their individual claims by said pretended settlement, their remaining copartners recover such amount as shall remain due on account of said cause or causes of action; and that, if necessary to that end an accounting be had between the members of said firm; and for general relief.

The defendants upon whom service was had having answered, the case was sent to a referee to take evidence, and at a hearing at special term, upon the pleadings and proofs, an interlocutory decree was rendered, to the effect that the settlement between Payson, Canda & Co. and plaintiff's copartners was collusive and fraudulent; that an accounting be had to determine the actual amount of work done by plaintiff's firm and the deficiency or difference between the same and the statement on which said settlement was made; that plaintiff is entitled to recover for such deficiency or such interest therein as may be determined on final hearing; with an order of reference to compute the actual amount of work performed by plaintiff's firm.

After the report of the second referee, a final decree was entered at special term, repeating the former finding that the settlement between Payson, Canda & Co. and plaintiff's copartners was fraudulent and collusive; and that plaintiff was entitled to recover from Payson, Canda & Co. on account of grading work done by plaintiff's firm, $98,151.50, with interest and costs.

From this decree defendants appealed to the general term, which decided that plaintiff was entitled to recover only one fourth of the amount for which judgment in his favor had been entered, that being the extent of his individual interest as a member of his firm; and rendered judgment for him for $23,803.38 and costs; and affirmed the judgment as thus modified and reduced.

From this judgment both the plaintiff and defendants appealed.

Mr. E. W. Paige, with Mr. Henry Brodhead, for plaintiff.

Messrs. William W. Niles and John Van Voorhis, for defendants.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are, possibly, some facts in the mass of testimony taken in this case which admit of an inference that the settlement assailed was fraudulent and collusive as against the plaintiff. The proofs have not impressed us with the soundness of that conclusion; but the question is essentially one of fact; and, in the face of the finding of the referee and its approval by the general term, we can only reverse upon the ground that there was absolutely no evidence of fraud. We hesitate to do that, for the reason that certain incidents were proved which standing alone would tend to show collusion between all the other parties to injure and impair the rights of Sweet; and while they seem to us fairly explained, the adequacy of the explanation has not struck all minds alike.

But conceding the fraud, and waiving the difficulty that the false estimates, if they were such, originated in the act and influence of the railroad company, which has been dismissed from the case, it is quite clear that such fraud was against Sweet alone and furnishes a cause of action to him only and not to his firm. His four partners, who made the settlement with Payson, Canda & Co., had competent authority for that purpose, which bound the firm. The terms of their partnership agreement distributed among the partners, the work to be done, assigning to Sweet, who was an engineer, the duty of conducting the financial settlements, and to his associates the work of grading.

Such an agreement ought not to be construed as abrogating or dividing the general partnership authority and making one absolute dictator over four, as to the finances of the firm, unless such an intention is quite clearly and distinctly developed. The agreement strikes us as not so intended. It did not forbid or prohibit the exercise of authority or the right to participate on either hand. In many firms the business is necessarily divided into departments which single partners specially control, but not to the absolute exclusion of the others or so as to abrogate utterly their partnership authority.

This agreement seems to us fairly of that character, and gave to Sweet a leadership or controlling influence in financial questions while he did his duty in exercising it, but did not strip his associates of their general partnership rights. But Sweet did not perform that duty. He went away to attend to other business of his own and left a letter directing Fleming to settle. He had no power to make such a substitution. When he surrendered his own control it went back to the firm and remained there, since he could not take up and abandon his duty at his pleasure.

The settlement made by the four partners, therefore, bound the firm. They lawfully represented it, and as to them there was neither fraud nor mistake. They allege neither, but deny both; and it follows that Payson, Canda & Co. were bound to pay the firm only the amount required by the settlement actually made.

Yet in spite of that it was possible for Sweet's partners and the other defendants to make, by collusion, a settlement—valid as between them but fraudulent as to him; and that is the fraud charged and the fraud proved, if there be any. Sweet may recover, not the debt due to the firm, for that is discharged, but damages for the fraud practiced upon him in the process. This is his individual right; and the resultant damages can only be measured by his individual loss, and that loss, if it exist at all, must necessarily be and can only be a diminution of his partnership share produced by a collusive waste of partnership assets.

But he has not proved any such loss. It cannot be known until a settlement of the partnership accounts what loss has resulted from the fraud. Payson, Canda & Co. are not bound to pay Sweet's firm or Sweet's partners anything. Primarily the action is by Sweet against his copartners, for a partnership settlement, in which he charges them with the willful and fraudulent waste of a valuable claim; and holds the debtors responsible also, by reason of their collusive participation. That is the sole theory upon which the action can be maintained.

To Sweet's partners and to his firm nothing is due from Payson, Canda & Co.; and they can be compelled to pay only what is needed to perfect Sweet's rights as disclosed by an honest settlement. He has a right, notwithstanding the settlement actually made, to be placed in the position he would have been in if the full debt had been honestly paid to his copartners, and he had received his aliquot share of the assets thus increased, after payment of the firm debts. When that is done he has obtained full justice and all to which he is entitled.

But as the case stands, his recovery may prove to be much too large or much too small. No final settlement of the firm accounts has been had and every effort to prove their exact condition was prevented by the rulings upon the trial. It may turn out that, even after charging the four partners with the entire amount of the disputed asset, Sweet has already had his full share and is entitled only to judgment confirming him in its possession.

In that event Payson, Canda & Co. would have nothing to pay. If it should appear that the firm debts are all paid, or if not, that the four partners are so solvent and able to pay their proportions as to permit that subject to be disregarded, and that Sweet has already had, from the firm, property in excess of a sum equal to one quarter of the disputed claim, then the sole relief necessary to his protection is a judgment confirming him in the possession of what he has received. His partners claim that to be the truth; that he took in advance and over and above his share all that this asset would produce; and, having got it already, has no claim to be paid it a second time.

On the other hand, that claim of the four partners may prove to be untrue, and it may further appear that large debts are outstanding for which Sweet is liable and, at least, if his partners are insolvent and unable to pay and all the other firm property is exhausted, he may require from Payson, Canda & Co. a sum sufficient to restore the solvency of the firm and secure him his share of the surplus, even if it took much more than the sum he has already recovered.

In other words, whatever loss of Sweet on a final adjustment of the partnership accounts can be traced to the waste of the disputed asset by his partners, in collusion with Payson, Canda & Co., must be made good to Sweet out of it. But when that is done, full justice is rendered and he is entitled to no more. The arbitrary award of one quarter of the claim was therefore erroneous, since no sufficient facts are found to justify it.

There were cross appeals from the judgment of the general term. The plaintiff appealed from so much of it as reduced his original recovery; and the defendants, because it permitted a recovery at all. The conclusion we have reached determines both appeals.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted; costs to abide event.

v.

Margaret SHEA, Appt.

When a married woman joins with her husband in a mortgage of his land, the mortgage is defeated as to both by a sale of the husband's interest in the mortgaged premises on execution under a prior judgment, and her dower interest in the land cannot be subsequently foreclosed under such mortgage.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the King's Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mortgage as to a dower interest. Reversed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 365.

Margaret Shea, the defendant, joined with her husband Martin Shea, in a mortgage of his real estate given to secure a payment of his debt. Thereafter the interest of the husband was sold, under a judgment against him recovered prior to the mortgage; and the sheriff conveyed such interest to the purchaser at the sale, who in turn conveyed it to Margaret Shea in April, 1882, a few weeks after the death of her husband, Martin Shea.

Thereafter this action was brought by the owner of the mortgage, to foreclose it as to the dower of Margaret Shea; and judgment of foreclosure and sale of the dower interest was ordered. From this judgment defendant appealed to the general term, where it was affirmed, and she appealed to this court.

Messrs. F. T. Magill and William N. Dykman, for appellant:

A feme covert or a widow may release her claim of dower so as to bar her; but she can invest no other person with the right to maintain an action for it.

Jackson v. Vanderheyden, 17 Johns, 167.

The joining with the husband in his conveyance is but a release by the wife of a contingent future right, and operates but by way of estoppel.

Malloney v. Horan, 49 N. Y. 111.

A stranger to the title cannot claim the benefit of such estoppel.

1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 284; Hawley v. Bradford, 9 Paige, 200; Green v. Putnam, 1 Barb. 500.

A quitclaim or release by a married woman to a stranger to the title is ineffectual to divest her of an inchoate right of dower.

Merchants Bank v. Thomson, 55 N. Y. 7.

If a mortgage is paid and satisfied, the release of dower ceases to operate. To deny that a release of dower falls when the conveyance it is joined with ceases to operate is to affirm that a wife's conveyance of her inchoate dower can stand alone. The exact opposite has been decided.

Martin v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 571.

Messrs. Ruggles & Baldwin, for respondent:

By joining with her husband in the mortgage, Margaret Shea released and relinquished to the plaintiff, mortgagee, and his assignors, all her dower interest or future contingent right in the mortgaged property; and having outlived her husband, and the debt being unpaid and the mortgage being valid, the mortgagee is entitled to the judgment of foreclosure and sale here appealed from.

2 Scrib. Dow. chap. 12, § 49; Hawley v. Bradford, 9 Paige, 201; Learned v. Cutler, 18 Pick. 9; Smith v. Handy, 16 Ohio, 191.

Her dower interest is liable for her husband's debt, the same being secured by his and her mortgage.

Leavenworth v. Cooney, 48 Barb. 570.

The respondent, plaintiff, has the right, although the dower has not been formally admeasured, to have judgment of foreclosure and sale thereof.

Tompkins v. Fonda, 4 Paige, 448; Payne v. Becker, 87 N. Y. 153; Pope v. Mead, 99 N. Y. 201.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The joinder by a married woman with her husband, in a deed or mortgage of his lands, does not operate, as to her, by way of passing an estate; but inures simply as a release to the grantee of the husband, of her future contingent right of dower in the granted or mortgaged premises, in aid of the title or interest conveyed by his deed or mortgage. Her release attends the title derived from the husband, and concludes her from afterwards claiming dower in the premises as against the grantee or mortgagee, so long as there remains a subsisting title or interest, created by his conveyance.

But it is the generally recognized doctrine that when the husband's deed is avoided, or ceases to operate, as when it is set aside at the instance of creditors or is defeated by a sale on execution under a prior judgment, the wife is restored to her original situation and may, after the death of her husband, recover dower as though she had never joined in the conveyance. Robinson v. Bates, 3 Met. 40; Malloney v. Horan, 49 N. Y. 111; Kitzmiller v. Van Rensselaer, 10 Ohio St. 63; Littlefield v. Crocker, 30 Me. 193.

In short, the law regards the act of the wife in joining in the deed or mortgage, not as an alienation of an estate, but as a renunciation of her inchoate right of dower in favor of the grantee or mortgagee of her husband, in and of the title or interest created by his conveyance. It follows, therefore, that her act in joining in the conveyance becomes a nullity whenever the title or interest to which the renunciation is incident is itself defeated. Scrib. Dow. chap. 12, § 49.

The wife's deed or mortgage of her husband's lands cannot stand independently of the deed of her husband, when not executed in aid thereof; nor can she by joining with her husband in a deed of lands to a stranger in which she has a contingent right of dower, but in which the husband has no present interest, bar her contingent right. Marvin v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 571.

These principles are, we think, decisive of this case. The plaintiff's mortgagee has been defeated by the paramount title, derived under the execution sale. It was the husband's mortgage and not the mortgage of the wife, except for the limited and special purpose indicated. The lien of the mortgage, as a charge on the lands of the husband, has by the execution sale been subverted and destroyed. Nor can the security be converted into a mortgage of the widow's dower, now consummated by the death of her husband. This would be a perversion of its original purpose. Her act in signing the mortgage became a nullity on the extinguishment of the lien on the husband's lands.

If on the execution sale there had been a surplus applicable to the mortgage, it might very well be held that the widow could not be endowed therein, except after the mortgage had been satisfied. The surplus would represent in part the mortgaged premises. See Elmen-dorf v. Lockwood, 57 N. Y. 322.

We think the authorities require a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment reversed and complaint dismissed, with costs.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

1. Where a court is called upon to adjudicate upon doubtful questions of law, or to determine as to inferences to be drawn from circumstances reasonably susceptible of different interpretations and calling for the exercise of the judicial function in their determination, its decision thereon does not render an order or process based upon it (although afterwards vacated or set aside as erroneous) void, or subject the party procuring it to an action for damages.
2. Where, however, the jurisdiction of the court is made to depend upon the existence of some fact of which there is an entire absence of proof, it has no authority to act; and if it nevertheless proceeds and entertains jurisdiction of the proceeding, all its acts are void and afford no justification to the parties instituting them, as against parties injuriously affected thereby.

4. Where a commitment for contempt sets out the facts and proceedings in detail, and otherwise complies with the rule in respect to the contents of a commitment, it will not be held void because it omits to state that the disobedience referred to as a contempt had "defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced" some "right or remedy" of the party in the action who procured it. (Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit Court, dismissing the complaint in an action of false imprisonment. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 30 Hun, 882.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the general term as follows: "The appellant was a member of the Kranken Unterstutzungs Verein Deutsche True und Einigkeit, and commenced an action in the court of common pleas against the individual members of the association, to dissolve it, and applied for an injunction to restrain the disposition of its funds. Upon such application he was met by the affidavits of forty-two members of the society represented by the defendant, J. C. Julius Langbein, as attorney of record.

"The plaintiff, through his counsel, thereupon charged that these forty-two members who had made affidavits, being Germans and unacquainted with the English language, were misled in signing and swearing to their affidavits containing averments prejudicial to his application; and it was agreed that the truth or falsity of his charge should determine whether he should or should not pay the referee's fees. If the forty-two members or a majority of them swore that they made the statement which appeared in the affidavit, the plaintiff was to pay the fees.

"An order of reference containing that provision in substance was thereupon entered by consent.

"The learned justice who made the order, in a subsequent proceeding said, in reference to it: 'Knowing the expense and vexation to parties, of references to determine disputed facts arising in the course of a motion, I endeavored to dissuade counsel from this course; but the course was taken, upon the strict agreement as to paying the expense which is embodied in the order of September 17, 1878, directing the reference.'

"The referee, after a bitter contest and it seems a protracted and tedious litigation, found in favor of the defendants. His fees were $180. Due notice was given that his report was ready for delivery. The plaintiff, however, neglected to take it up; whereupon, upon application by the defendants' attorneys, an order was made requiring the plaintiff to pay to the referee his fees within three days, or show cause why he should not be committed and the injunction vacated and the motion for injunction and the appointment of a receiver denied, and his proceedings stayed until such fees were paid. The plaintiff was heard upon the return of the order to show cause, and the judge ordered that the commitment should issue, which was accordingly done on the 4th of December, 1878.

"On the 5th of December, 1878, the plaintiff obtained a writ of habeas corpus, which was returnable at a special term; and an order was made on the 7th of December, two days subsequently, dismissing it with costs and remanding the plaintiff. The opinion of the court was expressed upon the subject, and declared that the relator desired a reference for a particular purpose, and it was granted on his stipulating to pay the referee's fees in a certain contingency; that the event had occurred, and the court had directed the payment of the fees in accordance with the compact made; that he refused or declined to pay, and for this contempt was committed.

"And it was held that the power of the court to commit, under the circumstances, admitted of no doubt; that the expensive process was adopted as a favor to the relator, on his promise to pay; and he was bound to keep it.

"On the 27th of December, 1878, the plaintiff obtained another writ of habeas corpus, which was also dismissed and the plaintiff remanded to jail.

"It appears further, that in March, 1870, the general term of the court of common pleas reversed the order of commitment upon the ground that the right of the clerk of the defendants' attorneys, who made the demand for the payment of the referee's fees, to make such demand, was not exhibited. 'But' the court added, 'in view of the bad faith exhibited on his side, we shall not award costs to the plaintiff; and we make it part of the terms of reversal that the plaintiff shall stipulate not to bring any action on account of his imprisonment. This stipulation must be handed up with the proposed order of reversal.'

"The stipulation was not given, and the court affirmed the order. The plaintiff then appealed to the court of appeals, where the order was reversed. 81 N. Y. 235.

"Subsequently this action was brought against the defendants, as the attorneys and counsel for the defendants in the original suit, to recover damages for false imprisonment."

Messrs. Wehle & Jordan and Samuel Hand, for appellant:

The order of December 4, 1878, was void upon its face because it did not adjudicate the plaintiff guilty of any act which amounted to a contempt of court. The order recites that plaintiff was guilty of a contempt. It asserts this as a conclusion of law, but it does not adjudicate any fact which amounts to a contempt. Such adjudication must appear in the order, to render it valid.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It cannot be disputed that an attorney who causes void or irregular process to be issued in an action, which occasions loss or injury to a party against whom it is enforced, is liable for the damages thereby occasioned. In the case of void process the liability attaches when the wrong is committed; and no preliminary proceeding is necessary to vacate or set it aside as a condition to the maintenance of an action. Process, however, that a court has general jurisdiction to award (but which is irregular by reason of the nonperformance, by the party procuring it, of some preliminary requisite, or the existence of some fact not disclosed in his application therefor) must be regularly vacated or annulled by an order of the court before an action can be maintained for damages occasioned by its enforcement. Day v. Bach, 87 N. Y. 56.

In such cases the process is considered the act of the party and not that of the court; and he is therefore made liable for the consequences of his act.

Void process is such as the court has no power to award or has not acquired jurisdiction to issue, in the particular case, or which does not in some material respect comply in form with the legal requisites of such process, or which loses its vitality in consequence of noncompliance with a condition subsequent, obedience to which is rendered essential.

Irregular process is such as a court has general jurisdiction to issue, but which is unauthorized in the particular case, by reason of the existence or nonexistence of some fact or circumstance rendering it improper in such a case. In all cases where a court has acquired jurisdiction in an action or proceeding, its order made or judgment rendered therein is valid and enforceable and affords protection to all persons acting under it, although it may be afterwards set aside or reversed as erroneous. Simpson v. Hornbeck, 3 Lans. 53.

Errors committed by a court, upon the hearing of an action or proceeding which it is authorized to hear, but not affecting any jurisdictional fact, do not invalidate its orders or authorize a party to treat them as void; but can be taken advantage of only by appeal or motion in the original action. Day v. Bach, supra.

There is no claim made that the order and commitment under which the imprisonment complained of in this case was effected, was void or even irregular, except for the alleged erroneous determination made by the special term, upon the merits of the application. This determination consisted in holding that a contempt had been committed by the plaintiff; while upon appeal this court held otherwise.

All of the facts constituting the alleged contempt were undisputed and were presented to the special term for its consideration upon the hearing. After hearing the parties, it decided that a contempt had been committed, and ordered the imprisonment complained of. It was conceded on that hearing that the plaintiff had disobeyed an order of the court; and the only question presented for its consideration was whether such disobedience defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced a right or remedy of the defendants.

Upon the appeal to this court it was held that the case did not clearly show that any right or remedy of the defendants had been defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced by the disobedience alleged; and the order adjudging the plaintiff guilty of a contempt was, for that reason, reversed as erroneous. Fischer v. Raab, 61 N. Y. 235.

A simple question of law was thus presented to the court, as to whether all the elements constituting the offense of contempt appeared on the application for the commitment. Whether they did or did not in no sense constituted a jurisdictional question. The court concededly had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter of the application, and we think authority to determine whether a contempt had been committed or not; and the question for its consideration was whether the facts of the case brought it within the statutory definition of a contempt. An erroneous decision of that question in no sense affected the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter of the application.

In a similar case it was said by this court that the fact that a justice of the peace "had jurisdiction of the person of the plaintiff and of the subject matter then pending did not give him judicial authority to adjudge her guilty of a contempt and to imprison her therefor. To have that authority there must have arisen before him facts which gave him power to consider of the question whether there had been a contempt committed by her. When facts arose which gave him that power, he had a right to adjudicate upon them, and is not liable to an action, although he may have held erroneously as matter of law." Rutherford v. Holmes, 66 N. Y. 370.

In the present case the court made an order upon the application of the plaintiff, referring a certain disputed question of fact to a referee to hear and determine; and in case such report was against the plaintiff, that he should pay the referee's fees incurred thereon. The plaintiff cannot question the validity of this order, for it was made at his request and upon his stipulation to pay the fees in the event provided for. The order was therefore lawful and such as the court had a right to make, under the circumstances. The report of the referee being against the plaintiff he was required to pay the fees and take it up; but this he neglected and refused to do. For this refusal he was adjudged guilty of contempt.

The disobedience of its order by the plaintiff gave the court jurisdiction of the subject matter, and called upon it to determine whether a contempt had been committed or not. The right to adjudicate upon this question did not depend upon the fact whether the plaintiff was guilty of a contempt, but whether a case had been made calling for an adjudication upon that question.

The power of the court to entertain jurisdiction of an action or proceeding does not depend upon the existence of a sustainable cause of action, but upon the performance by the party of the prerequisites authorizing it to determine whether one exists or not.

In Harman v. Brotherson, 1 Den. 537, the defendant, a judicial officer, had awarded a capias upon affidavits which did not disclose such a cause of action as subjected the defendant to arrest therefor. He was, however, arrested and imprisoned, and in an action against the judge for false imprisonment it was held that he was exempted from liability by reason of the judicial character of his determination.

In Landt v. Hiltz, 19 Barb. 283, a county judge was prosecuted for false imprisonment for granting an order of arrest which was afterwards vacated upon the ground that the affidavit upon which it was founded did not show a sufficient cause for arresting the party. It was held, however, that the decision and the order protected the party applying for it, and the attorney and all persons acting in obedience to the order; that the affidavit presented "a state of facts which called upon the officer to pass judicially upon the question and to determine whether a case for an order was made out or not. * * * It presents, to say the least, a colorable case and that is enough to protect the officer who issued it."

It was further said "that the doctrine that the judicial officer is protected whenever he has jurisdiction and enough is shown to call upon him for a decision, even though he err grossly, and even intentionally, has long been firmly established. * * * Upon the same principles of public policy, parties who in good faith institute the proceedings, and act under and in accordance with judicial determination, should be protected from accountability as trespassers whenever the officer is entitled to protection."

This case is largely and approvingly quoted from in Marks v. Townsend, 97 N. Y. 509.

In Miller v. Adams, 7 Lans. 138, affirmed in this court, 52 N. Y. 409, the defendant was prosecuted for false imprisonment in procuring an attachment for contempt against a third party for not appearing before the judge in supplemental proceedings, in obedience to an order requiring him to do so. The affidavit upon which the attachment was issued was held upon appeal to be defective and not to show the existence of the contempt alleged. It was held, however, that it constituted a protection as well to the officer issuing it as to the party procuring it; that the officer issuing the attachment had "jurisdiction of the matter and acted judicially in making the order; and it is entirely clear that he cannot be made answerable as a trespasser for an error in judgment."

It seems to us that the case of Williams v. Smith, 108 Eng. C. L. 596 [S. C. 14 C. B. N. S. 596], is indistinguishable in principle from this. As concisely stated by Chief Justice Erle it was as follows: "The master of the rolls decided on the facts that Williams was guilty of contempt in not obeying the order. Such is the judgment of the master of the rolls on the very fact between the parties." The legal inference which that learned judge drew from the facts which were presented to him on the part of Williams was that he was guilty of a contempt. Upon appeal the Lord Justices were of opinion that the master of the rolls came to an erroneous conclusion, and they reversed his decision. That is a totally different thing from setting aside the attachment for irregularity in the proceedings. It was held that the decision of the master of the rolls was a judicial determination that protected the parties acting under it as well as the officers making it.

The rule to be deduced from these authorities seems to be that when a court is called upon to adjudicate upon doubtful questions of law or determine as to inferences to be drawn from circumstances reasonably susceptible of different interpretations or meanings, and calling for the exercise of the judicial function in their determination, its decision thereon does not render an order or process based upon it (although afterwards vacated or set aside as erroneous) void, or subject the party procuring it to an action for damages thereby inflicted.

Where the jurisdiction of the court is made to depend upon the existence of some fact of which there is an entire absence of proof, it has no authority to act in the premises; and if it, nevertheless, proceeds and entertains jurisdiction of the proceeding, all of its acts are void and afford no justification to the parties instituting them as against parties injuriously affected thereby. But if the facts presented to the court call upon it for the exercise of judgment and reason upon evidence which might in its consideration affect different minds differently, a judicial question is presented which, however decided, does not render either party or the court making it liable for the consequences of its action.

It is further claimed that the defendants made themselves liable in this action by refusing to consent to the discharge of the plaintiff by the sheriff after he had complied, as it is alleged, with the terms of the commitment, and for opposing before the special term motions made for his discharge.

These proceedings all took place before it was finally determined that the plaintiff was not guilty of a contempt in refusing to obey the order referred to and, so far as any thing appearing in this record shows, when the defendants naturally believed that the plaintiff was rightfully imprisoned thereunder. The motions were denied by the courts before whom they were made; and it must here be assumed that they were rightfully denied, for the reason that the plaintiff had not complied with the terms of the order entitling him to a discharge.

If the defendants were not liable for damages for the original imprisonment, it is quite certain that they were not responsible for the action of the sheriff or the court in continuing it. No obligation rested upon the defendants to consent to or procure the discharge of the plaintiff, as the right to such relief depended solely upon his compliance with the terms of the order committing him.

Some claim is made that the commitment was void for not containing the statement that the disobedience referred to as contempt had defeated, impaired, impeded or prejudiced some right or remedy of the defendants in the action. Not only the order and affidavit upon which it was founded, but the commitment itself stated in detail the proceedings which it was claimed the disobedience in question affected, and presented all of the facts upon which the judgment of the court in awarding the commitment was based, and fully complied with the requirements of the rule in respect to the contents of a commitment.

The judgment of the court below should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Richmond Circuit Court in favor of defendants in an action of trespass for destroying an oyster bed. Reversed.

Reported below, 32 Hun, 49.

Plaintiff planted a large quantity of oysters in a spot or bed between high and low and below low water mark, in Staten Island Sound, an arm of the sea, within the Port of New York, and together with his ancestors had been so planting oysters in the same bed for fifty years or more. The bed was properly staked and marked, and there was no natural growth of oysters there.

While plaintiff was in possession and had a large quantity of oysters planted in this bed, one Baltazer Kreischer, owning upland on the island adjacent to this bed, obtained a grant of the land under water in which this bed was situated, from the State of New York through the commissioners of the land-office.

In June, 1881, a few months after this grant was obtained, the defendants, the sons of the grantee, who were the owners of a terra cotta factory situated below the locus in quo, dredged the sound in front thereof and caused the dredging to be dumped upon the locus in quo, thereby destroying the oyster bed.

Defendants had actual and constructive notice of the oysters being planted in this bed and saw plaintiff's stakes; but neither they nor the grantee ever gave any notice to plaintiff or anyone else to remove said oysters, nor did they give notice to anyone that they were about to appropriate their grant. Plaintiff brought this action for the alleged trespass. At the trial the court directed the jury to find a verdict for defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. On appeal by plaintiff to the general term this judgment was affirmed and plaintiff appealed to this court.

The terms of the grant to Kreischer, as far as they are material in this case, are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Benjamin Patterson, for appellant: Oysters planted in a bed clearly marked out and defined in the tide waters of a bay or arm of the sea, which is a common fishery to all the inhabitants of the State where the bay or arm of the sea is situated, and where there are no oysters growing spontaneously at the time, are the property of the person who plants them; and the taking of them by another person is a trespass for which an action lies.

The Legislature recognizes the right of property in such oysters, and makes it a misdemeanor to take and carry them away.

Such oysters being personal property, the State could not take them for public purposes without making compensation (Const. art. 1, § 6); and for private purposes not at all, be-

2 Bl. Com. chap. 2, p. 126.

Plaintiff had a property in these oysters. He had them planted in the locus in quo lawfully and under the protection of the state laws. He was not a trespasser. No valid construction of the grant could make him such. And for the defendants to have destroyed his oysters as they did was actionable.

There was no actual appropriation pursuant to the reservation of the grant.

The acts of the defendants, being contra formam statuti could not be construed an actual appropriation. No man can take advantage of his own wrong.

The grant is to be strictly construed in favor of the people and against the grantee.

Lansing v. Smith, Langdon v. Mayor and Dermott v. State, supra.

Martin v. Waddell's Lessee, 16 Pet. 367 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 997).

The dumping by these defendants was not an actual appropriation, and the rights of fishing remained unimpaired, and the destruction of plaintiff's oysters gave an action against the defendants, either under the principle laid down in Lansing v. Smith, supra, and cases cited above, or that laid down in 6 Taunt. 44, or that in McCarty v. Holman, 22 Hun, 55.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The authorities sustain the propositions asserted by the plaintiff that, by the common law, oysters planted in a bed clearly marked out and defined, in the tide waters of a bay or arm of the sea, which is a common fishery to all the inhabitants of the State where the bay or arm of the sea is situated, where there are no oysters growing spontaneously at the time, are the property of the person who plants them; and the taking of them by another person is a trespass for which an action lies. Fleet v. Hegeman, 14 Wend. 42; Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. 592; Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. 589.

This planting of oysters in tide waters, and the right of property in the person planting them, is not regarded as an exclusive appropriation of the right of fishery common to all the inhabitants of the State, but as a legitimate exercise of the common right, not inconsistent with its reasonable enjoyment by others. Cases supra.

The right to plant oysters in the tide waters of bays and arms of the sea, upon the lands of the State adjacent to the County of Richmond, not being a natural oyster bed, is now recognized by the statute which prohibits any person from interfering with oysters so planted without the consent of the owner. Laws 1866, chap. 404; chap. 753.

The space on which the plaintiff's oysters were planted had been used as an oyster bed for more than fifty years; and there can be no doubt that, both by the common law and the statute, the plaintiff was in the lawful use of the oyster bed on April 28, 1881, when the commissioners of the land-office granted to Baltazar Kreischer, the owner of the adjacent upland, the land under water, embracing the oyster bed of the plaintiff.

The defendants justify their act in depositing the material dredged from other premises upon the plaintiff's oyster bed, thereby covering and destroying the oysters thereon, under the grant to Baltazar Kreischer.

Unless the defendants are protected by this grant, there can be no doubt that their act in depositing this material in the waters of the bay was unlawful; and that upon familiar principles the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the special injury occasioned to him thereby.

Chapter 846 of the Laws of 1881 prohibits the depositing in the Port of New York of any dredging or other material within certain limits, which include the locus in quo, except in the erection or construction of any pier, etc., and the making, by filling in, of land authorized by the laws of this State.

It is not claimed that the defendants, in covering the plaintiff's oyster bed, were exercising any right other than that conferred by the grant to Baltazar Kreischer. That grant contains the following material exception: "Excepting and reserving to all and every the said people the full and free right, liberty and privilege of entering upon and using all and every part of the above described premises in as ample a manner as they might have done had this power and authority not been given, until the same shall have been actually appropriated and applied to the purpose of commerce by erecting a dock or docks thereon, or for the beneficial enjoyment of the same by the adjacent owner."

It is clear from the words of the exception that the plaintiff's right to the continued use of the oyster bed, and his property in the oysters thereon, was not eo instanti terminated on the execution and delivery of the grant. It is unnecessary to inquire what the right of the plaintiff would have been, if the grant had been absolute and unqualified. It is sufficient for the present purpose to notice that it did not confer any right to interfere with the uses to which the land was then appropriated, or with the common rights of fishery and navigation, until the granted premises should be "actually appropriated and applied" by the grantee to the purposes mentioned in the grant.

It was claimed on the trial, in behalf of the defendants, that the filling in, in June, 1881, over the plaintiff's oyster bed, was with a view to the construction of a dock, for the beneficial enjoyment of the premises embraced in the grant; and was therefore a lawful act, constituting an actual appropriation of the premises, within the exception.

The plaintiff's counsel asked to have the question, whether under the evidence there had been an actual appropriation of the premises under the grant, submitted to the jury. The court refused the request, and thereupon directed a verdict for the defendants; to which the plaintiff's counsel excepted. We think the exception was well taken.

We do not intend to intimate any opinion as to what conclusion should have been reached by the jury, upon the question whether this deposit was made with a view to the improvement of the land embraced in the grant. It seems quite clear that the primary object of the dredging was to deepen the water in front of other premises occupied by the defendants.

One of the defendants testified that they deposited the material with a view to making a dock on the premises embraced in the grant. It appears, however, that nothing was done in execution of this purpose, beyond depositing this loose material, which was left subject to the action of the winds and tides; and the purpose of building a dock, if originally entertained, was evidently abandoned. Under the circumstances, it was we think for the jury to say whether the depositing of the material from the dredging, over the plaintiff's oyster bed, was with a bona fide view to the improvement of the premises, or was done simply as a convenient way of getting rid of the material, and without any intention of making an actual appropriation of the premises within the grant.

The question whether the defendants, assuming that the material was deposited with a view to the improvement of the granted premises, were chargeable with notice of the existence of the oyster bed and were bound, before covering it, to notify the plaintiff and give him an opportunity to remove the oysters, is not presented by any exception and need not be considered.

But for the error upon the point suggested, the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted.

All concur, except Miller, J., absent.

v.

WHITEHALL WATER POWER CO.,
Limited, Resp't.

Land, conveyed by a deed from one who had acquired the same under foreclosure, was described therein as bounded on one side by a certain creek; the bank of the stream along the deeded premises was high and precipitous; the water rights in the stream had for a long time been used by the owners of a mill property on the stream just below the deeded property, and no attempt to use the water power had ever been made by the occupants of the deeded property, until a short time before the execution of the deed, when it became available to them through the destruction of the mill dam below.

Held,
(a) That, in view of the location and physical condition of the deeded property, title was acquired only to a strip of land along the stream, with no rights in the lands under water, or in the water power.

(b) That the owners of the mill property below should not be restrained from rebuilding their dam.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Washington Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action seeking to restrain defendant from setting back water on land of the plaintiff, by means of a dam, with damages for the injury already inflicted thereby. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 84 Hun, 630
For the purposes of the trial, the following facts were admitted:

First. On the 7th of December, 1852, and for several years prior thereto, John H. Boyd, late of Whitehall, had been the owner of the mill lot, so-called, in the Village of Whitehall, containing about twenty-five acres, embracing all the falls of Wood Creek, described as lying easterly of the lands and waters formerly of Ebenezer Proudfit; subject, however, to certain mortgages held by John Williams, a former owner of the premises, the lien of which mortgage dated back to March, 1822.

It is not admitted that Ebenezer Proudfit was ever the owner of any of these lands.

There was excepted from the lien of said mortgages a portion of said premises, which are particularly described in a deed thereof from Andrew Anderson to William Wait, dated September 30, 1847.

The defendant has acquired all the title and rights conveyed by said deed and is now the owner thereof.

At the date above mentioned a dam extended across said creek, near the foot of the falls, which set back the water and destroyed the natural fall thereof along the bank, above said dam and throughout the length of a portion of said premises known as the Phoenix barn lot or lot No. 22, now occupied by plaintiff and others.

This dam, and the water power therefrom after said date, was being used by said Wait and the owners and occupants of the adjoining mill sites until the year 1864, when said mills were destroyed by fire and said dam was carried away by high water in the following year.

On the 14th of October, 1863, said John H. Boyd executed and delivered to one Ami D. Gibbs a warranty deed of said Phoenix barn lot. This lot had been used for the purposes of a barn for several years prior to 1863. It was used for a barn by Gibbs until 1863, when Robert Irwin leased the same of said Gibbs and erected a mill on a portion thereof, and placed therein a steam engine and boiler and operated the same by steam power for three or four years and until 1875, at which date Baldwin & Perry and also J. D. Hancock each occupied a portion of said lot under a contract or lease with said Irwin.

Between October, 1841, and January, 1865, said John H. Boyd conveyed to divers persons parcels of said mill lot.

In November, 1870, an action was commenced to foreclose the mortgages covering said mill lot, except said factory lot.

The action was brought by Fanny Williams, the owner of the mortgages, against said Ami D. Gibbs, Robert Irwin and Benjamin F. Lacca, who then were the only occupants of said Phoenix barn lot and who were made parties defendant, together with divers other persons, occupants of some portion of said mill lot.

Said Gibbs, Irwin and Lacca, appeared in said action. In 1876 a decree of foreclosure and sale was rendered in said action, which determined that the sum of $14,775.50 was justly due and owing to the plaintiff, upon the bond and mortgage described in the complaint therein; and that the whole of said mill lot, except said factory lot, was liable for the payment of the same; that said mill lot should be sold at public auction by a referee to be appointed by the court, for the purpose of paying said sum so due to the plaintiff, besides the cost and the disbursements of the action, in the following order, to wit:

First. To sell all of said premises which had not been alienated since the lien of said mortgage debt attached thereto.

Second. To sell the alienated portions in the inverse order of alienation, or so much thereof as should be necessary to satisfy the mortgage debt and the costs and disbursements of the action.

Said decree further provided that if upon the sale of that portion of the premises known as the Phoenix barn lot, the same were not sold to Robert Irwin or his assigns, said Irwin or his assigns should or might remove all buildings, machinery and fixtures placed by either of them on said premises, he or they leaving them in as good condition as they were on the 29th of April, 1872. Said decree also provided that any of the parties to said action might become purchasers at the sale thereof. The sale under said decree took place August 31, 1876.

Upon the evening preceding the sale it was agreed between the plaintiff's attorney and the attorneys for several of the owners and occupants of portions of the mill lot, including said Gibbs and said Irwin and Lacca, that the referee should sell all the water rights and privileges of Wood Creek, with the unalienated portions of said lot; the same embracing the mill sites below said dam.

Said attorneys had no other power or authority to make such agreement than that conferred by their retainers as attorneys in the action.

There were present on the sale on August 31, 1876, in person, Ami F. Gibbs, Robert Irwin and Benjamin F. Lacca, with their attorneys, and James D. Hancock.

The referee first offered for sale lot A, upon a map of said premises there present. The description of the lot was read and reference made to the map before offering the same for sale. According to the description and the map, lot A embraced three parcels, the third parcel embracing all the water and lands under the water of Wood Creek and Lake Champlain, bounded north and south by the north and south bounds of said mill lot, west by the lands and water formerly of Ebenezer Proudfit, and easterly by the high water mark of Wood Creek and Lake Champlain.

Lot A, as thus offered for sale, was struck down to the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit, Fanny H. Williams, for $3,750, she being the highest bidder therefor, and no objection was raised by anyone present at the sale.

After selling lot A the referee offered several other lots for sale and had realized $9,500 when the Phoenix barn lot was offered.

Reference was made to the map before offering it for sale, and it was described as bounded south by James Greenough's lot, west by Wood Creek, north by the axe-helve-shop lot, east by Williams Street, the lot being 185 feet on William Street and about 80 feet wide from William Street to Wood Creek. It was struck down for $2,126, to James D. Hancock, who signed a memorandum annexed to the terms and the order of sale.

The lot was subsequently divided into three parcels and three separate deeds executed by the referee thereof, 55 feet being conveyed to Hancock, 40 feet to Baldwin & Perry, and 90 feet to Robert Irwin and Joseph Wilson.

The referee made a report of sale which was filed November 24, 1876, and which was duly confirmed, with the consent of all the attorneys mentioned.

Prior to said sale James D. Hancock had constructed a dam across said creek opposite that portion of lot 22, conveyed to Baldwin & Perry; and had placed a water wheel next to the westerly bank of the stream, and transferred power by rope therefrom to said premises; and the same was being used in running and operating machinery by Hancock, Baldwin & Perry, and Irwin & Wilson, at the date of said sale. This wheel was so placed and used, after having obtained the permission of Adin Thayer, one of the canal commissioners of the State of New York having charge of canals; the westerly bank of the stream being the easterly bank of the Champlain Canal at this point.

On the 30th day of September, 1881, said Hancock conveyed the portion of the lot occupied by him to the plaintiff, Edwin W. Hall, who used and operated said water wheel in connection with said dam in the operation of said mill and machinery, until the commencement of this action and until the same was interfered with by defendant's dam.

The defendant, as a corporation of the State of New York duly organized for the purpose of purchasing and improving the water power of Wood Creek, prior to this action commenced to erect a dam on the falls of said creek below the plaintiff's dam, and since this action in November, 1882, completed the said dam and thereby set back the water and interfered with the running of plaintiff's wheel; and since then has prevented him from running and operating said mill altogether.

At the foreclosure sale, before mentioned, Hancock also purchased a lot north of said lot 22, and adjoining the same, bounded on the west by Wood Creek at high water mark.

At this point and along lot 22, the easterly bank of the stream consists of a natural wall of stone extending upwards from 12 to 15 feet above high water mark. The bulkhead of defendant's dam abuts against the easterly bank of the stream at a point opposite plaintiff's lot, last mentioned, which is bounded west by Wood Creek at high water mark.

Mr. Esak Cowen, for appellant:

An easement over mortgaged premises may be cut off by making the owners parties to the foreclosure.

Packer v. Rochester & S. R. R. Co. 17 N. Y. 292, 297.

So far as mere legal rights are concerned, upon a bill of foreclosure, the only proper parties to the suit are the mortgagor and the mortgagee and those who have acquired rights under them, subsequent to the mortgage. The mortgagee has no right to make one a party defendant who claims adversely to the title of the mortgagor and prior to the mortgage.

Eagle P. Ins. Co. v. Lent, 6 Paige, 687, approved in Corning v. Smith, 6 N. Y. 84.

The position of the defendant is that of assignee of the mortgage. As such it can only hold the title which the mortgage gave to Williams, prior to foreclosure; and that cannot include an easement which was not in existence at the date of the mortgage.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the plaintiff's grantor, Hancock, took title under his deed, only to the strip of upland, 30 feet wide, lying between William Street and Wood Creek; and that he acquired no rights in the land under the waters of the creek or in the water power. This we think is the true construction of the deed from the referee in the foreclosure suit, to Hancock, in view of the situation of the property and of the circumstances existing at the time of the conveyance and prior thereto.

The description in the deed from the referee is similar to that contained in the deed of the Phoenix barn lot, dated in 1868, from John H. Boyd and wife to Gibbs, under whose lessee (Irwin) Hancock afterwards held the premises in dispute until the sale under the foreclosure.

The Phoenix barn lot consisted of a strip of land on the easterly side of Wood Creek, lying between William Street and the bank of the creek, which was precipitous, being a natural wall of stone, the top of which was from 12 to 15 feet above the surface of Wood Creek when the water was high. This strip of land, called the barn lot, was about 185 feet long and 30 feet wide from William Street to the edge of the bank. It had for many years prior to 1863 been used for a barn site, and was so used for several years thereafter.

No attempt appears to have been ever made by any occupant of the barn lot prior to 1875, to make any use of Wood Creek, for power or otherwise. The water power of the creek had been used for a great number of years, by a factory and grist mill north of and adjoining the barn lot at or near the mouth of the creek. These establishments were supplied by means of a dam built across the creek at the north end of the barn lot, which dam had stood from 1818 to 1829 and from 1841 until 1864, when it was carried away.

While the dam stood, it set back the water opposite the barn lot so as to deprive it of any fall, and thus, as well as by the natural conformation of the land, the barn lot was entirely separated from the creek and was in fact enjoyed and treated as a separate property. In 1868, and while the mill and factory were in operation, and the dam was standing, using all the water power of the stream opposite the barn lot, Boyd and his wife conveyed to Gibbs the lot known as the Phoenix barn lot, by the following description: "Bounded south by James Greenough's lot, west by Wood Creek, north by the axe-helve-shop lot and east by William Street; the lot hereby conveyed is about 185 feet on William Street and about 30 feet wide from Wood Creek to William Street."

Gibbs continued to use the lot exclusively for the purposes of a barn until 1868 when he leased the same to Irwin. Irwin subleased to Baldwin & Perry the southerly portion of the lot, and to James D. Hancock the northerly 55 feet thereof. The dam previously existing having been carried away in 1865, Hancock, in 1875, for the first time, undertook to use the water power opposite the portion of the lot occupied by him.

While Hancock was in occupation as lessee, the whole property known as the mill lot was sold under judgment of foreclosure of the Williams mortgage (which was a lien paramount to the title of Gibbs and his lessees); and at the foreclosure sale, which took place August 31, 1876, Hancock, the grantor of the plaintiff, became the purchaser of the lot in question; and it was conveyed to him by the referee, by deed dated September 5, 1876, wherein it was described as "bounded on the north by lot T, on the west by Wood Creek, on the south by a lot marked 228, on the east by William Street; the lot hereby conveyed being 55 feet in length along William Street from and off the end of said barn lot, and about 30 feet in width from Wood Creek to William Street."

At the same sale (at which Hancock was present), and before he purchased the lot, other parts of the mortgaged premises, together with "all the waters and land under the water of Wood Creek," within the boundaries of the old mill lot, including the land under water and the waters in front of the barn lot, were sold by the referee to parties other than Hancock; but the referee in this action finds that Hancock, at the time of his purchase and of receiving his deed, did not know of this prior sale of the waters in question.

In view of the location and physical condition of the property, its history and the definite specification of the dimensions of the plot conveyed to Hancock, we think it quite clear that the intention was to convey only the strip of upland 30 feet wide lying between the edge of the creek bank and William Street; and that the description was not intended to include any part of the waters of Wood Creek, or any water rights therein. Higinbotham v. Stoddard, 72 N. Y. 94.

These water rights had for a great number of years been enjoyed and used by the owners of the mill property on the north, near the mouth of the creek; and it was not until 1875, just before the foreclosure of the mortgage, that any attempt had been made by the occupants of the barn lot to use the water power, which had become available for the time by reason of the destruction of the old dam, the rebuilding of which by the defendant is the matter complained of by the plaintiff in this action.

Without going into the questions as to the defendant's title, and without intending to intimate any doubt in respect to it, we think the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Miller, J., absent.

v.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD R. R. CO., Resp't.

1. The statutory sanction which will justify an injury to private property must be express or must be given by clear and unquestionable implication from the powers expressly conferred, so that it can fairly be said that the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury.
2. If a railroad company has the right, under an Act of the Legislature, to acquire land by purchase (for the accommodation of its business), it must secure such a location as will enable it to conduct its operations without violating the just rights of others.
3. Assuming that the general power given by the Laws of 1848, chap. 148, § 6, to the New York & New Haven R. R. Co. to run its trains into New York City over the New York & Harlem Railroad includes, as incidental thereto, the power to purchase land for an engine house, it does not sanction the maintenance of a nuisance, injurious to private property, resulting from the building and use of an engine house.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are relieved, by the findings of the trial judge, from any question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish that the engine house, as used by the defendant, constitutes under the general rule of law a private nuisance to the property of the plaintiff.

The compromise exacted by the necessities of the social state, and the fact that some inconvenience to others must of necessity often attend the ordinary use of property, without permitting which there could in many cases be no valuable use at all, have compelled the recognition in all systems of jurisprudence, of the principle that each member of society must submit to annoyances consequent upon the ordinary and common use of property, provided such use is reasonable both as respects the owner of the property and those immediately affected by the use, in view of time, place and other circumstances.

It is in many cases difficult to draw the line, and to determine whether a particular use is consistent with the duties and burdens arising from vicinage, or whether it inflicts an injury for which the law affords a remedy.

There is, however, upon the evidence and findings in this case, no room for doubt. The plaintiff, from 1870, has been the owner of a house on East Forty-Sixth Street in the City of New York, used as a private residence, of the value at that time of at least the sum of $20,000.

In 1872, the defendant, the New York & New Haven Railroad Company, purchased a lot adjacent to the lot of the plaintiff, extending from Forty-Sixth to Forty-Seventh Streets, and bounded on the west by Fourth Avenue; and erected thereon an engine house and coal bins for the use of its road; and since the year 1872 has used the engine house for the reception, sheltering, storing, cleaning, oiling, dumping, repairing, and firing of its locomotives, and the coal bins for coaling the same.

The engine house was designed to accommodate eleven locomotives, and has eleven smoke stacks, extending above the roof to about the height of the third story windows of the plaintiff's house. The court found that the engine house and coal bins were so constructed and used by the defendant as necessarily to cause damage from the use thereof to the plaintiff's dwelling house, and that the coal bins were unprovided with sufficient covering to prevent the dust of the coal, from time to time stored therein and removed therefrom by defendant, from passing into and upon the plaintiff's land and dwelling house.

The court further found that there is now, and at all times since 1872 has been, emitted from the engine house and smoke stacks, and from the defendant's engines in the engine house, hurtful and offensive gases, smoke, soot, and cinders, and coal dust from the coal bins; and that the same pour down upon, and are borne by the winds into and upon, the plaintiff's dwelling house and premises, filling the house with smoke, soot and cinders, injuring the furniture and clothing therein, rendering the air offensive and unwholesome, and the house uncomfortable and unhealthy as a habitation, and greatly reducing the rental value of the premises.

The evidence fully justifies the findings of the court. It was shown that the house was rendered untenable, and could not be rented, although before the erection of the engine house, it had been rented for $2,500, a year; that the plaintiff's son became ill in consequence of the unwholesome atmosphere, and that she was compelled to remove him from the house on that account, and that the value of the house had diminished one half, a depreciation caused in great part at least by the maintenance and use of the engine house.

In short the engine house, as used, practically deprived the plaintiff of the use of the house as a residence. The defendant did not physically eject her therefrom, but by filling it with smoke and dust, and by corrupting and tainting the atmosphere with offensive gases, made life therein uncomfortable and unsafe.

It is scarcely necessary to cite authorities to show that the engine house as used was, within every definition, a nuisance for which, as between individuals, an action would lie for damages, and for which a court of equity would afford a remedy by injunction. See St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cases, 642; Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 811; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568.

In Radcliff's Exrs. v. Mayor, 4 N. Y. 198, a case which is often cited to sustain the doctrine that consequential injuries to private property, from the prosecution of public improvements do not give a right of action, Bronson, Ch. J., referring to the general rule that a man may do what he will with his own property, said: "He may not, however, under color of enjoying his own, set up a nuisance which deprives another of the enjoyment of his property."

The correctness of the findings of fact, made by the court, is not questioned by the defendant. The court placed its judgment, denying relief, upon the ground that defendant was a railroad corporation, authorized by law to acquire real estate for an engine house; that an engine house, at the point where this engine house was erected, was necessary for the operation of its road; and that in the construction and use of the engine house and coal bins it had exercised all practicable care.

The findings of law from these premises were that "Whatever damage has resulted to the plaintiff or her property, by reason of defendants' use and occupation of its engine house and coal bins, is damnum absque injuria."

It is manifest that if this judgment can stand, a most serious injury is inflicted by the defendant upon the plaintiff, for which she has no redress. Her premises are subjected to a burden in the nature of a servitude in favor of the defendant, which seriously impairs the value and enjoyment of her property.

The principle upon which the court below proceeded was that what the Legislature has authorized the defendant to do can be neither a public nor private wrong; in other words the Legislature has authorized the maintenance of this nuisance by the defendant, and the plaintiff must bear the consequences. The court below, in denying any relief to the plaintiff, of course assumed that the legislative authority, and the act of the defendant thereunder, resulting in flooding the plaintiff's premises with soot, smoke and noxious gases, was not a taking of the plaintiff's property, within the Constitution.

We place our judgment in this case upon the ground that the Legislature has not authorized the wrong of which the plaintiff complains; and it is therefore unnecessary to determine whether the Legislature could have authorized it consistently with the principles of the Constitution for the security of private rights without providing for compensation.

The legislative authority under which the defendant seeks to justify the maintenance of the nuisance in question is found in section 8, chap. 143 of the Laws of 1848, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act, entitled 'An Act Relating to the New York & Harlem Railroad Company,' passed May 7, 1840." That section authorizes the defendant, the New York, New Haven Railroad Company, to enter upon and run its cars by the power or force of steam, animals or any mechanical power, over the road of the New York & Harlem Railroad Company from the point of junction of the two roads in Westchester County, to and into the City of New York, "upon such terms and to such points as has been or may hereafter be agreed upon by and between said companies."

The defendant is a Connecticut corporation. Its road extends from New Haven in that State to a point on the Harlem Railroad in Westchester County in this State. It constructed the part of its road in this State from the state line to its junction with the Harlem Railroad at Williams' Bridge, under the authority of the Act of the Legislature, chap. 195 of the Laws of 1846.

When the Act of 1848 was passed, the two companies had entered into an agreement for the use by the defendant, for its cars, of the tracks of the Harlem Railroad from Williams' Bridge to the City of New York, in which among other things, the New York & Harlem Railroad Company agreed to furnish the defendant Corporation room for its engine house at Thirty-Third and Forty-Second Streets, not to exceed one half of the real estate of the former Company at that place, for which the defendant was to pay as provided in the agreement.

It is claimed that the Legislature has authorized the erection and use of the defendant's structure on Forty-Sixth Street. The only express authority conferred by the Legislature is found in the sixth section of the Act of 1848 above referred to. The authority conferred by that section, on the face of it, is simply an authority to the defendant to run its cars on the Harlem Railroad to the City of New York, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the two companies. The most obvious purpose of this section was to confer corporate capacity upon the defendant to do that which, without legislative authority, it could not do, viz.: operate its road beyond the terminus fixed in the Act of 1846, from Williams' Bridge to the City of New York.

But even this authority was not absolute. It could be exercised only in case and upon the terms of an agreement between the two companies, for the use by the defendant of the tracks of the Harlem Railroad. Upon this slender authority is based the claim of the defendant that the Legislature has authorized the injury in question. The argument in brief is: the Legislature has authorized the defendant to run its trains into the City of New York, over the Harlem road; it cannot do this without an engine house conveniently located; the power to acquire lands for and to construct an engine house is therefore incidental to the power expressly given; the Company has exercised due care in its location, construction and maintenance; the annoyances suffered by the plaintiff are a necessary consequence of its use, and therefore the principle applies "That an act done under lawful authority, if done in a proper manner, can never subject the party to an action, whatever consequences may follow."

We shall pass without examination the question whether the authority given to the defendant to purchase land for an engine house is implied in the power conferred in the sixth section of the Act of 1848, to enter into an agreement with the Harlem Railroad for the use of the tracks of that road and to run its cars thereon, to the City of New York.

For the purpose of this case we shall assume that the general power conferred included the latter power as incident. It is no doubt a settled principle of the law that many things may be done by the owner of land causing consequential damages to his neighbor, for which the law affords no remedy. The cases embraced within this rule are those either where what was done was in the lawful and reasonable use by an owner of land, of his own property, or where the damages suffered, although by possibility attributable to the wrongful act of another, were too remote therefrom to justify the court in treating the one as the sequence of the other.

The case before us belongs to neither of these categories. The defendant's engine house as maintained, was a palpable nuisance, causing special injury to the plaintiff, for which, by the general rule of the common law, she has a right of action. The defendant, however, does not rely for its justification upon the ordinary rule governing the rights of adjoining proprietors; but, as we have said, it rests upon the claim that the Legislature has authorized the acts of which the plaintiff complains, and has therefore made that lawful which otherwise might be unlawful, and has taken away any remedy which the plaintiff otherwise might have had.

It is undoubtedly true that there are cases in which the Legislature, in the public interest, may authorize and legalize the doing of acts resulting in consequential injury to private property, without providing compensation, and as to which the legislative sanction may be pleaded in bar of any claim for indemnity. Indeed, such is the transcendent power of Parliament that it is the settled doctrine of the English law that no court can treat that as a public or private wrong which Parliament has authorized; and consequently, as stated by Blackburn, J., in Hammersmith, etc. R. Co. v. Brand, L. R. 4 H. L. Cases (Eng. & I. App.), 171, "The person who has sustained a loss by the doing of that act is without remedy, unless in so far as the Legislature has thought it proper to provide for compensation."

The legislative power in this country is subject to restrictions; but nevertheless private property is frequently subjected to injury from the execution of public powers conferred by statute, for which there is no redress. The case of consequential injuries resulting from street improvements authorized by the Legislature is a familiar example.

In Radcliff's Exrs. v. Mayor, supra, which is a leading case, the Corporation of Brooklyn laid out, opened and graded a street, under an authority contained in the charter; and the court held that in the absence of negligence, the city was not liable for consequential damages suffered by the plaintiff from the sliding down of his land, caused by the cutting down of the street, and thereby removing the lateral support. The court in its opinion declared that it had never been considered that consequential damages to private property, resulting from the opening and improving streets or highways, or other work of a public nature, could be recovered.

The case has been frequently followed, and its authority completely established by repeated decisions in this State. It is an application of a principle well settled, that private interests must yield to the public welfare; but the case carries to the utmost limit the right of the Legislature, for public reasons, to interfere with private property to the injury of the owner, without making compensation.

The case of Bellinger v. New York Cent. R. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 42, is another case frequently cited to support the claim that a use of property authorized by the Legislature cannot, in the absence of negligence, constitute an actionable injury. It was an action brought for the flooding of the plaintiff's land on the Mohawk Flats, caused, as was charged, by the turning of the water of the West Canada Creek out of its natural course, by an embankment constructed for the use of the railroad, over the low lands west of the creek.

The Utica and Schenectady Railroad Company (to whose rights and obligations the defendant succeeded), was created a corporation by chapter 294 of the Laws of 1833, with power to construct a railroad between Schenectady and Utica "on the north side of the Mohawk River as far as the Village of Herkimer." The charter authorized the directors to locate the line where it would be most advantageous for the road, and file a certificate of location; and the charter declared that the line so located should be deemed the line upon which the road should be built. The company located its line on the creek at the point in question. It constructed a bridge across the creek, 500 feet long, and also left a water way eighty-two feet wide in the embankment, for the passage of water in time of flood. The freshet which flooded the plaintiff's land occurred at the time of breaking up of ice of the creek in the spring. It was shown that ice and water flowed and was forced upon the plaintiff's premises at the breaking up of the creek in 1799, and again in 1813, and on three occasions after the road was built, between 1835 and 1866. There was some evidence tending to show that the flooding in question was occasioned by the embankment, and the want of sufficient apertures for the passage of the water. The plaintiff recovered a verdict and the judgment was reversed by this court, upon the ground of the rejection of evidence offered by the defendant, bearing upon the point whether the embankment and bridge were carefully and skillfully constructed. It was claimed by the counsel for the plaintiff that this was an immaterial issue. The court in its opinion conceded that according to the general rule of law, if the structure of the defendant caused the injury, it would be liable irrespective of negligence; but held that as the company was authorized by statute to construct its road across the creek at the point where it was located, it was liable only for such consequences as were attributable to a failure to exercise due care and skill in executing the statute authority.

The case of Bellinger v. New York Cent. R. R. Co. is perhaps the strongest case to be found in our reports of the application of the doctrine that a statutory authority justifies acts which otherwise would give a right of action. But it will be noticed that it was a case where the line of the road was fixed by the charter. It was necessary, in constructing the road on that line, to cross the creek on a bridge, and the low lands upon an embankment. The flooding of the plaintiff's premises was an unusual occurrence, and the evidence was very slight that it was caused by the structures of the defendant. It was under these circumstances that the court reached its conclusion that the damages suffered by the plaintiff were not recoverable in the absence of negligence on the part of the defendant, in the construction of the road.

But the statutory sanction which will justify an injury to private property must be express, or must be given by clear and unquestionable implication from the powers expressly conferred, so that it can fairly be said that the Legislature contemplated the doing of the very act which occasioned the injury.

This is but an application of the reasonable rule that statutes in derogation of private rights, or which may result in imposing burdens upon private property, must be strictly construed; for it cannot be presumed, from a general grant of authority, that the Legislature intended to authorize acts to the injury of third persons, where no compensation is provided, except upon condition of obtaining their consent. This construction of statutory powers applies with peculiar force to grants of corporate powers to private corporations, which are set up as a justification for acts to the detriment of private property.

In the case of Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 162, the chancellor granted an injunction to prevent the Village of Newburgh from diverting the waters of a stream, under an Act of the Legislature which authorized in general terms the taking of water for the use of the village, and which provided for compensation to the owner of land on which the spring or source of supply was situated, but made no provision for compensation to the owner of land below, through which the stream passed.

When that case arose there was no provision in the Constitution of the State prohibiting the taking of private property for public use, without compensation. But the chancellor held that the making of compensation was an indispensable attendant of the exercise of the public right; and, what is more material to our present purpose, he declared that the Legislature could not have intended, by the general powers conferred, to violate or interfere with private rights.

The same principle is stated with unusual force of language by Chief Justice Marshall, in United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 390 [6 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 314]. He says: "Where rights are infringed, where fundamental principles are overthrown, where the general system of the laws is departed from, the legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible clearness, to induce a court of justice to suppose a design to effect such objects."

What may be a sufficient statutory sanction for acts which injuriously affect general public rights or individual property is illustrated by cases which hold that an authority to construct a railroad and use locomotives thereon, takes away any remedy by indictment or private action, for such consequences as necessarily result from the use of locomotives, such as noise, vibration, etc., although no compensation is provided. Reg. v. Pease, 4 Barn & Adol. 30; Vaughan v. Tuff Vale R. Co. 5 Hurl. & Nor. 679; Hammer-Smith, etc. R. Co. v. Brand, supra.

There are two recent English cases which apply with great distinctness the principle that a statutory sanction cannot be pleaded in justification of acts which, by the general rules of law, constitute a nuisance to private property, unless they are expressly authorized by the statute under which the justification is made, or by the plainest and most necessary implication from the powers expressly conferred. These are the cases of Hill v. Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 438; S. C. on appeal, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 193, and Truman v. London, Brighton, etc. R. Co. L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 423.

The case of Hill v. Managers, etc., was an action for damages, and for an injunction to restrain the use of a small-pox hospital, established by the defendants under the direction of the poor law board, under the authority of the Metropolitan Poor Act of 1857. The Act of Parliament authorized the erection of asylums for sick, infirm and insane paupers in the metropolitan asylum district in London, to be designated by the poor-law board; and authorized the purchase, leasing or filling up of buildings for that purpose; and the Act referred to small-pox patients as among the class of persons to be provided for. The managers, under the direction of the poor law board, erected a hospital for small-pox patients, near premises of the plaintiff. The jury found that the hospital was a nuisance occasioning damage to the plaintiff.

The court, on the hearing, granted an injunction; and the case was appealed to the House of Lords, where it received great consideration, and the judgment was affirmed. The defendants justified under the Act of Parliament. The judges pronouncing opinions conceded that according to the settled doctrine of English law, if Parliament had expressly authorized the construction of the hospital upon the very site where it was located, its use in the manner and for the purpose contemplated could not be restrained by injunction, except in so far as it was negligent, although such use should constitute a nuisance at common law, and no compensation would be due in respect of injury to private rights, unless provided for in the Act.

But it was held that the statutory sanction, sufficient to justify the creation of a nuisance, must be express; that the particular land or site for the hospital must have been defined in the Act; or, as held by one of the judges, it must appear that the Act, while defining certain general limits, could not be complied with at all without creating a nuisance; and its performance was made imperative.

In the House of Lords opinions were pronounced by Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson, all concurring in substantially the same view. Lord Watson said: "If the order of the Legislature can be implemented without nuisance, they cannot, in my opinion, plead the protection of the statute: and, on the other hand, it is insufficient for their protection that what is contemplated by the statute cannot be done without nuisance, unless they are also able to show that the Legislature has directed it to be done. Where the terms of the statute are not imperative, but permissive, when it is left to the discretion of the persons empowered to determine whether the general powers committed to them shall be put into execution or not, I think the fair inference is that the Legislature intended that discretion to be exercised in strict conformity with private rights, and did not intend to confer license to commit nuisance in any place which might be selected for the purpose." [L. R. 6 App. Cas. 213].

The case of Truman v. London, Brighton, etc. R. Co. was also an action for damages and for an injunction to restrain a nuisance created by the maintenance, by the defendant, of the cattle yards at its station at East Croydon. The defendant was authorized by its charter to purchase lands in such places as it should deem eligible for the purpose of providing station yards for and unloading cattle, etc. It purchased lands for that purpose adjoining East Croydon Station, but near the dwelling of the plaintiff. The court found that the company acted bona fide in selecting the site, and conducted the business with all practicable care; but also found that it created a nuisance to the plaintiff, and granted the injunction.

That case arose after the decision in Hill v. Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, and was decided upon the principles there laid down. It is manifest that these cases, if well decided, completely answer the defense in the present case. See also Reg. v. Bradford Nor. Co. 6 Best & Smith, 631; Atty-Gen. v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 147; Hooker v. New Haven & N. Co. 14 Conn. 146; S. C. 15 Conn. 312.

The authority conferred upon the defendant by the sixth section of the Act of 1848, to run its trains over the Harlem Railroad, was not, however broadly construed, a legislative sanction to commit a nuisance upon private property. The authority expressly given was not absolute, but conditional upon obtaining the consent of the Harlem Railroad.

It could not be known by the Legislature that the building of an engine house would necessarily interfere with private rights. However necessary it may be for the defendant that its engine house should be located where it is, this constitutes no justification for the injury suffered by the plaintiff; nor is it any answer to the action that it exercises all practicable care in its management. It may have the right which it claims: to acquire land by purchase, for the accommodation of its business; but it must secure such a location as will enable it to conduct its operations without violating the just rights of others.

Public policy indeed requires that in adjusting the mutual relations between railroad companies and individuals, courts should not stand upon the assertion of extreme rights on either side; but in this case the facts leave no room for doubt that the plaintiff has suffered a substantial and unauthorized injury.

The case of Baltimore & Polomac R. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 739], fully supports the conclusion we have reached in this case, and the able opinion of Mr. Justice Field in that case vindicates the right of private property to protection against substantial invasions under color of corporate franchises.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Edmund WARING et al., Exrs. of William E. Waring, Deceased, Appts.

In an action to recover a certain award to "unknown owners," for land taken for public purposes, paid to defendants' testator, plaintiff claimed to be entitled thereto by force of adverse possession under a written instrument. Held, under the circumstances of the case, that there having been some evidence that the land was "usually cultivated or improved" and "protected by a substantial inclosure," for more than twenty years preceding the date of the award, and the jury having found a verdict in favor of plaintiff, his claim to adverse possession was well founded.

Memorandum of decision below, 86 Hun, 643.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John E. Burrill, for respondent.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been here once before (76 N. Y. 463), and the most important legal questions involved were then settled.

The action was brought to recover certain awards made to "unknown owners" for the taking of certain land in the City of New York, for the opening of Madison Avenue, which awards were paid by the city to defendants' testator upon his claim to be the owner of the land. Both parties claim the land taken, by title derived from Peter Poillon. His conveyance of the land in the chain of plaintiff's title was made June 21, 1827; and if that conveyance had been at one recorded, there is no dispute that plaintiff's title to the land and the awards would have been perfect. But the infirmity in his title arises from the fact that that conveyance was not recorded until August 15, 1864.

Poillon's conveyance of the land in Waring's chain of title was dated January 29, 1861, and recorded the next day. So the defendants have the best record title; and if there were nothing more, their title to the money awarded for the land and paid to their testator would have been perfect.

There is no evidence that any of the persons under whom the defendants claim were ever in the possession of the land or ever exercised any acts of ownership over the same. But the plaintiff claims that his grantor was in the actual, open, notorious possession of the land by his tenant in January, 1861; and hence that within the rule laid down in Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76, and other cases, there was constructive notice to Poillon's grantee, at that time, of the prior unrecorded deed and of the rights acquired thereunder. He also claims that for more than twenty years before the land was taken by the city and the awards made, he and those under whom he claims were in the actual possession of the land, claiming under the conveyance from Poillon; and hence that his title to the award was perfect on that account.

The persons who knew most about the facts relating to the possession were, at the trial of this action, dead; and hence the evidence as to such possession was not as certain and definite as could be desired. But it was submitted to the jury under instructions as to the law which we must, in the absence of the charge or any exceptions thereto, assume to have been proper and satisfactory; and their verdict in favor of the plaintiff must be regarded as conclusive, so far as there was any evidence upon which it could be based.

To make out the adverse possession in this case it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the land was "usually cultivated or improved," or that it was "protected by a substantial inclosure," 2 R. S. 294; Code, Proc. § 83; Code, Civ. Proc. § 370.

Here, without going particularly into the evidence, we are satisfied that there was some evidence from which the jury could find that both of the conditions mentioned were satisfied during a period of more than twenty years preceding the date of the awards; and that plaintiff's claim of adverse possession was therefore well founded.

Without, therefore, determining whether at the date of the second deed of Poillon, to wit: January 29, 1861, plaintiff's grantor was in the open, notorious and actual possession of the land, within the meaning of the case of Brown v. Volkening, and other cases cited, we are of opinion that for the reasons stated the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

DeWitt C. ELLIS, as Assignee, et al., Resp'ts.

A clause in a lease, providing that lessor shall have a lien for rent upon all goods and other personal property of lessee, a retail dealer, which then are or may be thereafter put upon the leased premises, and providing that the lessor may, in case of default in payment of rent, take and sell such goods, etc., in the same manner as in the case of a chattel mortgage, and providing that the lessee may continue in possession of the goods and sell the same in the regular course of his business and buy other goods with the proceeds (although valid as between the parties) is fraudulent on its face as to bona fide creditors of the lessee, and cannot be enforced by the lessor as an equitable lien upon the goods, against the rights of an assignee of the lessee for the benefit of creditors, in possession of the goods.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action seeking to enforce a lien upon personal property. Affirmed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 47.

Statement by Danforth, J.:

This is an equitable action brought by the appellant for the purpose of subjecting the proceeds of certain chattels theretofore sold by the defendant Ellis, as assignee, etc., to the payment of rent due and to become due from the defendant, H. F. Van Dake.

It appeared upon the trial that in March, 1879, the plaintiff, as lessor, and H. F. Van Dake, as lessee, executed a lease by which the former let and the latter agreed to take certain premises for a boot and shoe store for the term of five years from the first of April, 1879, at the rent of $2,000 for the first year, and a greater sum thereafter, payable monthly in advance, with interest after three days from maturity; and in case of default in payment, or seizure of the goods and merchandise, or other personal property in or upon the premises, by virtue of any writ, judgment, execution, assignment, or otherwise, the whole amount of such rent and interest agreed to be paid should immediately become due and payable, and to that should be added any sums due for water rates or gas.

Then followed this clause: "And it is further agreed that the lessor shall have a lien as security for all the rent and interest, gas bills and water rates aforesaid; or for any damage to building due from lessee, upon all goods, wares, chattels, implements, fixtures, tools and all other personal property, which are or may be put on the demised premises, belonging to the lessee, or to anyone holding or claiming the demised premises, or any part thereof, under him as assignee, under tenant or otherwise; and such lien may be enforced on the nonpayment of any of said rent, interest, water rent or gas bills, by the taking of such property and the sale thereof in the same manner as in case of a chattel mortgage on default thereof; such sale to be made upon six days' notice posted upon the demised premises, or served upon said lessee. Such lien, however, shall not be enforced against any property which, being a part of stock in trade, shall have been sold in the regular course of business."

It was found by the trial judge (eleventh finding) that at the time of the execution of this lease it was agreed between the parties thereto that the lessee "should remain in possession of the said mortgaged goods in said store, and that he might sell the goods covered by said mortgage, in said store, and use the proceeds in his business, buying other goods with the money as opportunity offered; and using the proceeds of the sales to meet his liabilities and in the prosecution of his business and in supporting his family and paying his hired help;" and also (twelfth finding) "That at the time said chattel mortgage lease was executed, the said Henry F. Van Dake was in possession of said store and all the goods therein, and thereafter continued in possession of said store and of the mortgaged goods, and continued to deal with the said mortgaged property, consisting chiefly of boots and shoes, in which he was a retail dealer, as he had been accustomed to do before the giving of the chattel mortgage lease, buying and selling boots and shoes as opportunity offered, and using the proceeds of his sales in the prosecution of his business and in the support of his family and in paying his hired help in all respects as if no mortgage were in existence; all of which was done with the knowledge and approval of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff never had possession of any of the goods covered by said chattel mortgage lease."

This condition of affairs continued until the 5th of January, 1881, when H. F. Van Dake made a general assignment to DeWitt C. Ellis, of all his property including that upon the leased premises, for the benefit of his creditors, among whom as preferred creditor was the other defendant, Harriet S. Van Dake.

On the same day, and without notice, actual or constructive, of any claim on the part of the plaintiff Ellis, as assignee, took possession of the property, and soon thereafter sold and converted it into money, realizing over and above expenses about $2,000.

Afterwards, but before the commencement of this action, the plaintiff demanded of the assignee, either payment of the rent accrued and due, "or delivery of the stock of goods, fixtures and other personal property in the store, to him as such lessee; claiming a right and lien under said lease prior and superior to that of said Ellis, under the assignment."

Mrs. Van Dake's debt accrued prior to the lease, and is greater than the proceeds of the assigned property. The plaintiff asked judgment that he be declared to have a prior lien upon the assigned property and its proceeds, and that he be paid therefrom $1,833.33 rent actually due, and $6,966.86 which became due by reason of default on the part of the lessee.

The trial court as conclusion of law found:

"First, that the said plaintiff had no lien on the goods in said store at the time the said assignment was made, as against the said assignee and the creditors of the defendant, Henry F. Van Dake.

Second, that the said chattel mortgage clause in said lease was absolutely void as against the assignee and creditors of the defendant, Henry F. Van Dake.

Third, that said chattel mortgage clause in said lease is fraudulent in law, as against the assignee and creditors of the said Henry F. Van Dake.

Fourth, that the complaint be dismissed with costs against the plaintiff."

The plaintiff excepted to these several conclusions of law; and after judgment appealed to the general term where it was affirmed.

Messrs. J. A. Stull and Benton & Dickinson, for appellant:

As between the plaintiff and Henry F. Van Dake, the lease was a valid instrument; and all its provisions, including the lien clause in question, were in force and binding upon Henry F. Van Dake as lessee, before and at the time he executed his general assignment, and ever since; and the lien clause attached to all property embraced within its terms which was upon the premises when the lease was executed, and on that which the lessee afterwards put thereon.

The claim of Harriet S. Van Dake against her husband was never placed in judgment; and as a general creditor, merely, she could not attack the lease nor prevent its enforcement, either on the ground that it had not been filed in the proper clerk's office, or on the ground that it was fraudulently executed.

Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424; Niagara Co. Nat. Bank v. Lord, Van Heusen v. Radcliff, and other cases cited above.

The lien clause in the lease did not constitute a chattel mortgage so as to subject the lease or the plaintiff's rights thereunder to the provisions of the several statutes regarding either the filing of chattel mortgages (Laws 1838, chap. 279, as amended by Laws 1879, chap. 418) or the fraudulent conveyances or transfers of personal property.

§ R. S. part 2, chap. 7, tit. 2, § 5, p. 2328 of 7th ed.

A chattel mortgage is a sale of goods and chattels upon conditions. Here were no words of sale, transfer or assignment, and no title passed thereby.

The general term was in error in holding that the plaintiff was not in as good condition to maintain this action as he would have been if his lease had been a chattel mortgage; and also that no actual lien existed against the property at the time it was taken in custody by the assignee; and that the equities of the creditors are just as great as those of the plaintiff; and that the court has no power to prefer one creditor over another.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 165-167; pp. 145-148; 3 Id. chap. 7, § 1233, et seq.

As against this lease, the general assignment may be considered as made in fraud of the plaintiff's rights as lien holder, and wrongful, unless made subject thereto.

Hale v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 49 N. Y. 634.

Mr. John M. Davy, for respondents:

The fraudulent nature of the mortgage consisted in giving the mortgagor credit by allowing him to retain possession of the mortgaged goods, and to sell them, and to use the proceeds in his business and otherwise, thereby inducing parties to give him credit.

The assignee in this case represents the whole body of creditors, and he had a right in their behalf to impeach the validity of the mortgage and show that it was fraudulent and void.

No special form of words is necessary to constitute a mortgage.

The statement in the lease that the lessee "is to have a lien for the rent, and that on default he may take possession and sell in the same manner as in a case of a chattel mortgage, sufficiently discloses the intent of the parties when they executed the lease.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon this appeal the expectation of success seems to rest chiefly upon a supposed distinction between the clause in question and a chattel mortgage. It is upon the appellant's points styled a "lien clause;" and the contention is that as it does not purport to pass the title to the property, it cannot be said to be a mortgage or a conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage, within the provisions of law in regard to the filing of chattel mortgages (Laws 1833, chap. 279; Laws 1879, chap. 418), or those which relate to fraudulent conveyances or transfers of personal property. 2 R. S. tit. 2, pt. 2, chap. VII, p. 136, §5.

No question upon such supposed distinction appears to have been presented upon the trial, but on the contrary the complaint asks that payment "be made out of the mortgaged chattels;" "that the assignee be enjoined from disposing of said mortgaged chattels," and that "a receiver of said mortgaged chattels and the proceeds thereof be appointed."

So, while it is impossible to tell from the record how much of the complaint is admitted, or what is denied, it is apparent that such was the understanding of the defendants, for the instrument is repeatedly referred to as "a chattel mortgage lease," and the goods as "mortgaged goods," and want of filing of the instrument, and the agreement made at the time of its execution, that notwithstanding its provisions, the lessees might continue to deal with the property, in all respects "as if no mortgage was in existence," are set up as affirmative defenses.

In the same language the trial judge deals with the case in his findings, and there was no request for any different finding or interpretation. But I do not think it is material to inquire how the paper may be characterized. Its form was no doubt devised in order to give by contract, to the landlord of the demised premises, that priority for the collection of rent which once existed by statute but which the Legislature had at the time in question abolished (Laws 1846, chap. 274); thus leaving the landlord to take his place with other creditors, and a debt for rent to be enforced like other obligations.

What then is the effect of the contract as expressed by the clause lying at the bottom of this controversy? It cannot be doubted that it was, as between the lessor and lessee, good as a contract, not only as to property in existence and on the demised premises when the lease was executed, but as to that afterwards acquired and brought on to them.

A similar agreement was examined in McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, and a taking by the lessor of property not in existence when the lease was made justified, upon the ground that in substance it had in equity all the characteristics of a mortgage, or of an equitable lien, which for the purposes of that case was said to be its equivalent. There the adverse party was the lessee.

That doctrine was applied in a similar action (Wiener v. Ocumpough, 71 N. Y. 118), against a person whose relation to the demised premises precluded him from acquiring any rights adverse to those of the lessor, and who therefore was in no better position than the lessee.

Here the question is in equity, and is raised by the lessor against an assignee for the benefit of the creditors of the lessee. In the cases cited the lessor had obtained possession of the things in dispute, and the first decision turned upon the validity of the agreement as to nonexistent property; the other upon the priority of the plaintiff.

So in Hale v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 49 N. Y. 626, there was an agreement for a future lien; and this was held to be sufficient against a defendant who made no title to the property as purchaser, creditor or otherwise, and had nothing but a naked possession tortiously acquired. In other words, the defendant showed no right to question the plaintiff's claim.

Here the assignment to the defendant is conceded to be valid, and it is found that under it he had taken possession of the property and actually sold it without notice of the plaintiff's claim, or the agreement upon which the claim was made; but notwithstanding all this, he has still the avails of the property in his hands; and if the appellant is right in his contention that the defendants' position is not better than that of the lessee, the plaintiff's lien will, upon general principals of equity, follow these proceeds.

We cannot agree, however, in that contention. The defendant represents creditors, and may treat as void all agreements made in fraud of their rights. Laws 1858, chap. 314.

He has greater power for this purpose than the creditor himself. The creditor can assert no right until by judgment and execution he has a lien, or a right to a lien, upon the specific property; but in favor of an assignee for his benefit, the Legislature has substituted a statutory right in place of these conditions. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424.

The defendant availed himself of this right, and, upon the facts found by the trial judge, his action in so doing must be upheld. There was not only no delivery or change of possession of the things covered by the agreement, but it was understood between the parties that there should be neither. It was therefore void, both at common law (Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80) and by statute. 2 R. S. p. 136, §5.

It is true, as the appellant says, the clause is not in express terms characterized as a mortgage; nor are the words "sale," "transfer," or "assignment," to be found therein, but that does not matter. It takes effect as a mortgage; and the "lien as security" is given by agreement, or to take the exact words, "it is between the parties further agreed" to that effect. While its object may have been to give one creditor priority over another creditor, it also involves a secret trust in favor of the owner of the goods, and forms the very cover of fraud which the statute condemns by declaring that "Every assignment of goods and chattels by way of mortgage or security, or upon any condition whatever," unaccompanied by delivery, "and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, shall be presumed to be fraudulent, as against the creditors of the vendor."

Nor is it of any consequence when the debt provided for by the assignment was created, whether before or after the lease was executed. It is enough that the relation of debtor and creditor existed at some time while such goods and chattels remained in possession of the vendor or assignor. 2 R. S. 186, § 6.

It is inconsistent, not only with this statute but with the principles of equity, that such a lien should be successfully set up, to the exclusion of bona fide creditors, and we are referred to no case where it has been done. The equity of the defendant as a mere representative of creditors, is at least equal to that of the plaintiff, while the former has superadded to his equity the legal advantage of possession, and the statutory authority to treat as void a conveyance in fraud of the rights of creditors. In these respects his position is better than that of the lessee, and equal to that of a creditor with judgment and execution.

But the learned counsel for the appellant argues that there was no evidence to sustain the eleventh finding (supra), viz.: that showing a fraudulent arrangement at the time of the execution of the lease, and therefore that the provisions of the Act of 1858, as to the powers of assignees, are not brought into operation. Conceding it to be valid between the parties, as we have done, we think it fraudulent upon its face as to creditors, and therefore void as to the plaintiff, their assignee.

The lessee was a retail merchant. The lease in terms permits him to sell his stock in the regular course of business and relieves so much of it from the lien. He in fact carried on the business the same after the lease as before. The stock of goods fluctuated, and the plaintiff had notice that it would do so when he gave the lease; he also knew that the defendant was to and did continue the business in that way. There was no restraint upon him in regard to it, or the disposition of the money when the goods were sold. We think the finding was fully justified by Edgell v. Hart, 9 N. Y. 213, and Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123.

The argument for the appellant suggests no ground upon which a court of equity can interfere in his favor.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

Board of COMMISSIONERS OF EXCISE OF the City of AUBURN, Rept..

v.

Cary S. BURTIS et al., Appts.

1. The amendment of 1879 to the charter of the City of Auburn (Laws 1879, chap. 53, title 7, §71), creating a board of charities and police, with the powers of overseers of the poor in towns, did not give such board the powers to sue for penalties for violations of the excise law; but such penalties are to be recovered in the name of the board of commissioners of excise, under the general provision of the Laws of 1878, chap. 109, that where there is no overseer of the poor, such penalties shall be sued for and recovered by and in the name of the board of commissioners of excise.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Cayuga Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover penalties for violations of the excise law. Affirmed.

The question presented and the terms of the statutes construed are set forth in the opinion.

Messrs. John D. Teller and Nathaniel Moak, for appellants:

Whenever a power is given by statute, every thing necessary to make it effectual, or requisite to attain the end in view, is implied.

That the board of charities and police is given enlarged powers does not affect the case; they are not inconsistent with the lesser powers of overseers which may be included in the greater.

It must be strictly pleaded.

Wright v. Wright, 54 N. Y. 441.

The second clause of the motion for a nonsuit: that the plaintiff had not made out a cause of action, did not raise the question of the plaintiff's capacity to sue, because that defense had not been pleaded.

The facts proven did make out a cause of action, and subdivision 8 of section 488 of the Code of Procedure, relating to facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, has no reference to the plaintiff's capacity to sue; and that question cannot arise under such objection.

A repeal by implication is not favored. On the contrary, courts are bound to uphold the prior law, if the two Acts may well stand together.

Unless the latter statute is manifestly inconsistent with and repugnant to the former, both remain in force. Courts are bound to uphold the prior law if the two can stand together.

Sedg. Stat. Law, p. 106; Williams v. Potter, 2 Barb. 316; People v. Deming, 13 How. Pr. 441.

To repeal a statute by implication, there must be such a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new law and the old one that they cannot stand together or be consistent.

Repeals by implication are never allowed but in cases where the inconsistency and repugnancy are plain and unwarrantable.

A subsequent Act which can be reconciled with a former Act should not be a repeal of it, although there be negative words.

A construction which repeals another statute should be very clear, especially when the repeal is a part of a statute and seriously mars the harmony of a system.

Hayes v. Symonds, 9 Barb. 260.

In the case of Cohoes v. Moran, 25 How. Pr. 385, 387, the village charter prescribed a penalty for selling intoxicating liquors on the Sabbath. The court held that this was not repealed by the subsequent provisions as to the same offense in the excise law. The court says:

"The provision in question may well be upheld, as a valid police regulation sanctioned by the Legislature and applicable to that particular locality, without coming into collision with any of the provisions of the general law. Repeals by implication are not favored."

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced to recover penalties for violations of the excise law in the City of Auburn, from the first day of June, 1890, to the first day of June, 1891. The plaintiff recovered, and the judgment having been affirmed at the general term the defendants appealed to this court.

The main question to be decided now is whether the action was properly commenced by the plaintiff or whether it should have been commenced by the board of charities and police of the City of Auburn; and the determination of the question involves the construction and consideration of various statutes.

From the incorporation of the City of Auburn in 1848, until 1879, there were overseers of the poor in that City, possessing the powers and duties of overseers of the poor of the several towns of this State. Laws 1848, chap. 106, § 8 of title 4, § 1 of title 9, §§ 1, 7 of title 11; Laws 1859, chap. 431, § 6 of title 5, § 1 of title 9; Laws 1869, chap. 273, §§ 5, 61, 203, 216.

By the Act, chapter 53 of the Laws of 1879, § 71, title 7, it was provided that "The commissioners of charities and police and the mayor ex officio shall constitute a board of charities and police of the City of Auburn of which the mayor shall be president."

Section 78 of the same Act reads as follows: "The said board shall possess the powers and execute the duties of overseers of the poor in towns, and may appoint a superintendent of charities and a clerk, when necessary, to aid in the discharge of their duties."

By chapter 628 of the Laws of 1857, § 22, the power to sue for violations of the excise law was given to the board of commissioners of excise of the different counties.

By chapter 820 of the Laws of 1873, § 1, section 22 was amended so as to read as follows: "The penalties imposed by this Act, except those provided for by sections 15 and 19, shall be sued for and recovered in a civil action in the manner provided by law for the recovery of penalties, by and in the name of the overseers of the poor of the town in which the alleged penalty was incurred; and the amount so recovered, when collected, together with all the costs of the proceedings for such recovery and collection, shall, within thirty days after such collection, be paid by the officer or party receiving the same to the county treasurer of the county, for the support of the poor of such county, except as is otherwise provided by law."

The same section was again amended by chapter 109 of the Laws of 1878, by providing that the penalties might be sued for and recovered in the name of the overseers of the poor of the town or city in which the alleged penalty is incurred, "except in such towns or cities as have no overseer of the poor; in which case said penalties shall be sued for and recovered by and in the name of the board of commissioners of excise of the town or city aforesaid, and paid over to the treasurer of the county, for the support of the poor of the town or city."

The claim of the defendants is that by the charter amendment of 1879 the board of charities and police for the City of Auburn was empowered to execute the duties of overseers of the poor; and that as it was among the duties of overseers of the poor to sue for penalties for violations of the excise law, that duty devolved upon that board.

The claim of the plaintiff is that when the office of overseer of the poor was abolished in the City of Auburn, and the board of charities and police was substituted in its place, there was, within the meaning of the Act of 1878, no overseer of the poor in the City; and hence, that it devolved upon the Board of Commissioners of Excise of the City to sue for these penalties; and we think the latter claim is supported by the best reasons.

After the enactment of chapter 109 of the Laws of 1878, it was the general system provided for the whole State that overseers of the poor, wherever they existed in the towns and cities of the State, should sue for and recover the penalties for violations of the excise law; but that where there were no overseers of the poor, such penalties should be sued for and recovered by and in the name of the commissioners of excise.

While such was the law and the system, the Act of 1879 was passed, and abolished the office of overseer of the poor in the City of Auburn, and thereafter there was no such office in that city; and the precise exigency existed which devolved upon the Commissioners of Excise the duty to sue for the penalties.

It cannot be supposed that when the Legislature devolved upon the new board created the duties of the office of overseer of the poor it meant to change the general system provided in the legislation of 1878, and to devolve upon the new board the duty to prosecute for violation of the excise law.

The two Acts of 1878 and 1879 must be construed together, and must be so construed that they can stand together; and upon such construction the latter Act must be so limited as not unnecessarily to interfere with the prior Act; and the duty which by the general law was imposed upon the Board of Commissioners of Excise cannot be held to be one of the duties devolved upon the new board created for the City.

It cannot be denied that much can be said and that much has been ably said in favor of the contention of the defendants upon the question in dispute; but the question is a technical one, having nothing whatever to do with the merits of the case; and we think the wiser and better rule is to hold that the general system provided by the Law of 1878 prevails everywhere in the State, where by its terms it is applicable, unless by some new enactment its provisions have been changed.

Other exceptions to which our attention was called upon the argument point out no error and require no special consideration.

The judgment should be affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term, in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Erie Circuit Court in favor of defendants, in an action for trespass on lands. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. B. Vedder, for appellant:

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by the defendants, upon land of which the plaintiff claimed possession and ownership.

At the trial it appeared that the premises were part of a large tract of land which in 1827 was granted by the State to Burrows, Williams and others who in 1828 made a partition of the same, and described the various parcels as bounded in part by certain streets and highways, and among others "by the highway formed by the continuation of the military road," referring also to a map of the Village of Tonawanda, made by Colton Fletcher in 1825; and one of the covenants into which the parties to the partition entered was that all the streets named in the deeds as bounding any part of the premises, "shall be continued as public streets according to the plan of them in the before mentioned map."

The plaintiff and one Mansfield bought of Williams a portion of this land, and in 1829 or 1830 took from him a contract, which was not produced; but the plaintiff testified that Mansfield subsequently quitclaimed to him the same premises, and his deed shows a grant of lots 1 and 6 in block 4 of the Village of Tonawanda, as described in a map made by Colton Fletcher and filed in Erie County. He also testified that the building, for tearing down which the action was brought, stood on the corner of Main and North Canal Streets in the central part of the Village of Tonawanda; that the lot he claimed was lot 1, and that Main Street was formerly known as the Military Road.

One of the defendants was the supervisor of the Town of Tonawanda; the others were its highway commissioners. At the time of the alleged trespass they were lawfully engaged in constructing a bridge over the creek at the point where Main Street intersected it. Upon that street its approaches were to be constructed. In carrying out a necessary retaining wall, they came to an old foundation wall. It was in no way occupied, and so far as appeared no person was in possession. They deemed it within the lines of the street and so adopted it, making it fit for their purpose; they set coping stones which brought it to the surface of the street. The plan required an iron railing. Its completion was delayed a few days and in the meantime, without the defendants' knowledge, the plaintiff proceeded to erect a small frame building, placing one corner of its frame upon the coping.

Before the house was finished, the defendants returned to put the railing upon the coping and, to do so, necessarily pushed away the plaintiff's structure. This was the trespass complained of; and the main question litigated was whether the building was within the lines of lot 1, or whether it projected into the street upon which it was conceded lot 1 abutted.

At the close of the case the plaintiff asked the trial judge to hold as matter of law that no defense had been made out; and the only question for the jury was as to damages. The court declined to do so, saying: "The question of the location of this line (of lot 1) is for the jury to determine."

Upon the evidence this was clearly so; nor is any point made upon this appeal to support the exception taken by the plaintiff to that ruling. The court, reviewing the whole evidence, charged the jury that if the plaintiff, in the erection of his building, kept within the lines of his lot, he was entitled to recover; otherwise, not. This was the simple and real issue in the case; it was fully tried and fairly submitted to the jury in a manner (and in various forms) so satisfactory that no exception was taken.

But another question was presented to the trial judge; and an exception to his ruling is now relied upon. The highway was not shown by any record; but, as we have seen, the plaintiff took his lot under a description bounding it upon the street; its existence was assumed by him throughout the trial and in his request for instructions to be given to the jury: "that the highway was limited to what the evidence showed had been actually used as such;" "Also, that the evidence failed to show that the building was an obstruction to the street, or a nuisance; that if it did stand within the bounds of a street or highway, no right has been shown in defendants to remove it." By the court: "I hold the other way, and have so charged." To this no exception was taken.

He also asked the court to charge that "The proof does not show any power in defendants over the street in question; that defendants had no power, as incidental to building the bridge, to remove plaintiff's building as obstructing the street or the approach to the bridge." The court declined, and plaintiff excepted.

Other requests followed, containing a similar implication. Upon the same assumption, he asked the court in substance to charge "that if the jury find that plaintiff had continuous possession of the land occupied by the removed building for twenty years under claim of title, the land belonged to him and he was entitled to recover;" and the court replied: "That would be so; but the evidence does not show any such title, unless there was a continuous possession for twenty years." Plaintiff excepted to that qualification.

To the same effect the court in commenting upon such a claim had already charged the jury, saying: "The evidence, however, does not show that continuity of possession which would constitute what the law terms 'an adverse holding,' so as to ripen into a title." To this the plaintiff excepted, and the trial judge then said:

"I submit the case substantially upon the propositions suggested. If you are satisfied that this wall of the bridge was placed upon what was actually a portion of this highway, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, without showing an uninterrupted possession for twenty years; while on the other hand, if it was placed on the plaintiff's land, and his building did not extend over and beyond to the east of his land, so as to render this act necessary, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It all depends upon where the actual location of this line was, unless there has been a continuous possession of twenty years; and whether he went over it or whether he kept within it. If he went over it, he had no right to complain; if he kept within it, then he had a right to indemnity."

The propositions referred to are the propositions of the plaintiff, presented by the requests already made, and the charge left the jury to determine the question as to adverse and uninterrupted possession. It was the last utterance of the court, and was no doubt intended as a withdrawal of the positive opinion, before expressed upon it. No request was made for a specific modification of the charge already given, and the general term has regarded the final charge as an answer to the exception to the refusal of the court before made, to leave the matter of adverse possession to the jury.

We are unable to agree in this view of the case. If the instruction first given was erroneous and upon a material point it cannot be said the jury were not influenced by it. It expressed a very strong opinion, more than once repeated, upon a matter finally left to the determination of the jury; and, in the absence of an explicit withdrawal by the court, fairly permits the inference that it affected the verdict. The jury having heard from the judge that the evidence did not show that continuity of possession which would constitute what the law terms "an adverse holding," so as to ripen into a title, could hardly be expected to come to a different conclusion upon the same evidence, but might readily concur in that reached by the judge, so long at least as it was permitted to remain a part of the instructions by which they were to be guided.

The remark of the judge was more than a comment upon evidence, which he might make according to his discretion; it was a decision that there was no evidence to support the plaintiff's contention. If that was error, it was not cured by subsequently leaving the question to the jury, as one which they also might determine. Veider v. Fellows, 20 N. Y. 126; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579; Allis v. Leonard, 58 N. Y. 288.

We are of opinion, however, that the instruction asked for was irrelevant to any question actually before the court. The issue was not between individuals nor in relation to private property. It concerned the public and its rights in the highway. The defendants at the time in question were town officers, engaged in the performance of official duty; and if the acts complained of were performed upon premises which at any time, no matter how long before, had been set apart as a highway, and by dedication had become such, the plaintiff could not recover, although he had occupied a particular portion of it from time to time, or even for a continuous period of time extending to twenty years. Mills v. Hall, 9 Wend. 315; Kellogg v. Thompson, 66 N. Y. 88.

There was no nonuser of the highways; and his occupation was a mere obstruction and nuisance for which no lapse of time would enable him to prescribe. Once established, a highway does not cease to be such until it has been discontinued by the proper authorities. Of that in question it was conceded that no record could be found; but the claim rested upon the dedication by the owner of the land and acceptance by the public through user.

Upon this point the learned trial court, after calling attention to the facts and circumstances relating to it, said: "For the purpose of maintaining a highway of this description, it is not necessary that the ground should be constantly or continually used, but that it should be used for the general purposes and convenience of the public, as a portion of a public thoroughfare or highway;" and the verdict of the jury under other instructions, to which I before adverted, shows that this was done over that portion of the land now claimed by the plaintiff, and which contained the locus in quo.

No exception was taken to this proposition, and it must be considered settled that that line of the highway included the wall in dispute. The jurisdiction of the defendants, in the performance of their duty, extended over the whole width of the highway as established, and each part of it. The plaintiff took his title subject to the easement; and no act of obstruction on his part could deprive them of their jurisdiction. Bridges v. Wyckoff, 67 N. Y. 180.

No acquiescence on their part, in any act of the plaintiff, could deprive the public of the right to use the whole highway, or in any degree lessen the duty of the defendants to remove obstructions, when that removal was necessary. Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 448.

In any view of the case, the plaintiff had upon the trial every opportunity which the law affords, to assert his title, and we think no error was committed by the learned trial judge, to his prejudice.

The judgment appealed from should therefore be affirmed.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

FAY'S ADMINISTRATORS

v.

FAY.

1. The use of words (here, "patent roofing") merely designating the kind of business one is engaged in, can not be protected as a trade-mark.
2. To recover for the "good will" of a business transmitted from one person to another it must appear affirmatively that there was a "good will" connected with the business, of some value in itself. Proof merely that the business is profitable is not enough.
3. Administrators cannot maintain a bill to have their coadministrator account for the "good will" of their intestate's business continued by their coadministrator with their consent, all the administrators being equally in the wrong for not turning such good will into cash as an asset of the estate.
4. Payment for the "good will" of a business must be claimed at the time of the transfer of the business.

(Filed October 12, 1886.)

ON bill for relief. Dismissal advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. J. J. Crandall, for complainants.

Mr. B. D. Shreve, for defendant.

Bird, V.C., filed the following conclusions:

This bill is filed by two of three administrators against the third, to compel him to account for the profits of business which they allege he carried on in continuation of the same as carried on by the intestate in his lifetime under a patent-right called "patent roofing." Briefly, the insistence is that the intestate, by means of his patent, carried on and established a profitable business under such patent and by the name of "patent roofing," which name, from long use, became a trade-mark of great value; and that the defendant having appropriated it to his own use, by advertising "patent roofing" and using bill heads with the same phrase on, became responsible to the complainants as administrators for the value of such business conducted under this so-called trade-mark, "patent roofing."

First, it is proved to a demonstration that the alleged patent was worthless, so that there does not seem to be the slightest foundation for a claim on that score.

Second, can a valuable right, such as the law protects, arise to any citizen under such circumstances? Was the phrase "patent roofing," adopted as a trade-mark? Did the intestate adopt that sign in order to distinguish his business from all his fellows in the market? Or did he use that phrase as expressive of his rights under the license issued by the government? I am constrained to believe the latter. I can pick up no bit of evidence that he intended to use the phrase in the former sense and to protect it as a trade-mark. To my mind the testimony is most clear that the intestate used the phrase, "patent roofing," not so much for the purpose of carrying on business under that mark, but simply to designate to the world the kind of business he was engaged in. It seems to me that this was done in the same sense in which hundreds of other dealers make known the special branch of business they may be engaged in. Under this category come dealers in boots and shoes, in dry goods, in dry goods and groceries, and the like. It strikes me that if the bill in this case can be sustained, then every person beginning either of the above vocations in dangerous proximity to one already in the field could be proceeded against. The law does not foster and protect monopolies in trade on any such general principles.

Third; but it is said by the complainants that the intestate, in his lifetime and at the time of his death, enjoyed what is termed a "good will," in the legal sense and that it was transmitted to them as his representatives. That the good will contemplated in the law is transmitted thus, I have no doubt. It is a subject of barter as any other right or thing is. But the good will must be shown to have some value in that sense, as distinguished from other dealers. Nothing in this direction has been presented. It does not appear that there was anything so special about the business or the mode of conducting it or the place as to give it peculiar prominence and profit in the estimation of business men or to secure to the owner advantages above all others which the law ought to protect him in. It seems to me that it would be quite dangerous for the courts to hold that every man who has a vocation has a good will in connection therewith which the law sustains; hence, I conclude that before the courts can aid in such cases it must appear affirmatively that there is a good will of some value, independent of every other consideration. The complainants urge that they have shown that this business was profitable to the intestate in his lifetime; but this is so far successfully assailed as to render their position too uncertain to found a decree upon. But they say the same business was continued by them for several months after the death of the intestate, at a profit of $100 per month; and this they press as the true standard of value. Everyone will see that the greatest injustice might be committed by basing a decree upon the many contingencies arising or intervening in every such case; for example, the condition of the market, the activity of business generally, the skill or industry of the managers and the like.

Fourth, if the complainants' showing be sound, then, instead of charging their coadministrator with the estimated value of the good will, I would charge them with great neglect of duty in not selling such good will, as was most plainly their duty in the very beginning, rather than carry on a venture at the risk of loss. With this neglect upon them, they are before the court without any claims upon its favor, unless;

Fifth, it is because their coadministrator is the defendant, and the person charged. Considering that when the court finds both parties in the wrong it leaves them there and will aid neither, the fact that the coadministrator now has the trade and is carrying on the business will not justify them in filing their bill. All three are alike accountable to the estate. All were alike bound to turn this good will into cash and available asset if anyone could be bound to pay cash for it.

Sixth, I cannot conclude that the defendant is liable under the circumstances, if I am in error in all of the foregoing conclusions. The complainants and defendant, as administrators, carried on the business of selling patent roofing for the estate, at the same place where the intestate had, from the month of May until October, when all parties interested agreed to sell all the office furniture and the machine, which it is claimed was patented, to the defendant for $50, and to rent the establishment to him for $10 per month.

If there existed any such thing as good will, it passed by fair implication, to the defendant. If it did not pass it still subsists or exists, and they have the right of power and it is their duty to sell it for the benefit of the estate. They had no right to make the sale of the office furniture to the defendant and allow him to proceed, under their own eyes, with the business until it has become of some value, and now to come to this court and ask for him to account. If they intended to make this claim, they should have done so at once, not allowing him to proceed as if by plain right.

I will advise that the bill be dismissed, with costs.

v.

GOEBBEL et al.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, payment after bill filed is properly set up by answer, and not by cross bill.

(Filed October 14, 1886.)

BILL to foreclose. On motion to strike out parts of answer. Granted in part.

The mortgage in suit was made by defendant Goebbel. Proceedings to foreclose were commenced by the mortgagee, Kaelble, some time since. He took a decree and was proceeding to sell when a third party, M., purchased the mortgage, with the proceedings thereon, and they were assigned. A rule was subsequently taken on Goebbel to show cause why Kaelble should not proceed to sell under his decree. Goebbel then answered, alleging payment to Kaelble (by means of the money furnished by M., the assignee of the mortgage, who is now taking steps to proceed) and questioning the right of M. to be placed in the shoes of Kaelble, and alleging that M. had agreed to withhold for five years, on payment of interest.

To this answer exceptions were taken.

Mr. Stephany, for the motion.

Mr. Abbott, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The first and third objections are aimed at the formal beginning and ending of the answer. Such beginning and ending are in violation of the rule of court, and consequently the motion to strike out must prevail.

The second objection is to that part of the answer which sets up a payment of all the principal, interest and costs to the complainant's counsel, since the commencement of the suit. The argument is that such fact can only be set up by cross bill. No authority has been shown me sustaining this objection. Nor does a careful research bring to light any principle which would justify a cross bill in such case.

A cross bill is filed when the defendant seeks affirmative relief; but when he simply defends, he proceeds by answer only. No fact can be more appropriately used by way of defense than payment. Indeed, I cannot imagine any other possible method of presenting the question than by answer, even though as in this case the payment is not made until after bill filed.

The second objection is not well taken. Prevailing on the other two, the complainant is entitled to costs.

VAN DERVEER et al.

Next of kin, although not interested in the real estate in question, are proper parties defendant to a creditors' bill seeking to charge a claim against an intestate decedent's estate upon lands formerly owned by decedent and alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed by him in his lifetime; the decedent having, at his death, left only personal property, and such personalty being alleged to be insufficient to settle the estate.

(Filed October 14, 1886.)

CREDITORS' BILL. On demurrer. Over ruled.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. John Schomp, for the demurrer.

Mr. H. F. Galpin, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The bill shows that the complainant had a just claim against Mary V. now deceased, in her lifetime, and that after the creation of such obligation she conveyed all her lands to her daughter Julia V.; that since then Mary V. died, without a will, that no administration has been had upon her personal estate, that no administrator has been appointed; and that said Mary V. did not leave goods and chattels or other personal estate enough, so far as the complainant can discover, to defray the expenses of settling her estate.

The bill alleges that Mary V. left four children her surviving, her only heirs at law. These are all made defendants. Nellie C., one of these children, files the demurrer to the bill and puts it on the ground that no decree is asked against her, nor can any decree be made against her under the bill as framed.

Although Nellie C. can have no interest in the lands which her mother conveyed, whether such conveyance be adjudged fraudulent or not, the same cannot be said with respect to the personal estate. The title to that remained in Mary V. at the time of her death. In such personal estate Nellie C. is interested as one of the next of kin. It could not be taken away from her without bringing her into court; nor could the personal estate be ignored by the creditor who seeks to charge the lands in the hands of the alleged fraudulent grantee, since the personal estate is the primary fund out of which to discharge the debts of the decedent. And to save all room for controversy, Nellie C. is not only made a party, but she is called upon to make discovery of any estate which was of her mother. In this respect relief is sought at her hands; and in this respect the court may be called upon to make an order or decree against her.

But independent of this prayer for discovery, I cannot but think that the bill is good as to Nellie C., in that it discloses that she is one of the next of kin and therefore has an interest in the personal estate left by the deceased. This, I say, is enough to sustain the bill, even though there be no other charge nor any prayer against her on which to base a decree. Such charge shows that she has an interest; and the prayer against her for subpoena brings her into court and enables her to make defense, if she so desires, and to protect her interest.

I think the demurrer should be overruled, with costs.

OSBORNE

v.

MUNROE et al.

1. A guardian who changes a first mortgage belonging to his ward's estate, to a second mortgage on the same premises, although (by part payment of the first mortgage) the amount of indebtedness upon the premises may not be changed, is yet liable to his ward for the amount of the second mortgage; the mortgaged premises having, on foreclosure, brought only enough to cover the amount remaining due on the first mortgage.
2. It is no defense to a guardian, in accounting to his ward, that he invested part of the ward's estate in real estate at the request of the ward, but without the previous sanction of the court.

(Filed October 9, 1886.)

BILL to render a guardian and the sureties on his bond liable for a loss to the ward's estate, arising from a change of securities by the guardian. Decree advised for relief asked.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. M. Rosenkrans and Mr. J. Linn, for complainant.

Mr. L. VanBlarcum and Mr. F. J. Swazy, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

I have given this case the fullest consideration, in the hope of being able to see my way clear to protect the defendants from the charges of the complainant and at the same time to do complete justice to the complainant, who at the time of the transactions complained of was an infant and the ward of the defendant Munroe.

I say this because I believe that the defendant Munroe acted in good faith. But I must remember that unless the case be a clear one the infant, who was innocent, ought not to suffer loss, even though there may be some doubt as to the extent of that loss. As the case is considered, all will agree that the complainant has the very highest claims upon the regard and watchfulness of the court.

In 1868 Munroe and S., as guardians, under the directions of this court sold the lands of O. and L., infants, for $5,496.15. They received in cash $1,000.15, and bonds and mortgages for $4,496. The mortgages were on the property conveyed. Of this amount $1,832 was set apart and secured, that the interest might be paid to the widow during her life; the interest on the balance $2,664 was to be paid to M. and S. And the whole $2,664 was to be paid in equal portions to O. and L. as they arrived at age; and the $1,832 was also to be paid to them on the death of the widow, if she survived their arriving at age; and if not, when they did arrive at age.

The interest was fully paid, and $1,164 was paid on the principal in 1875, thus reducing the incumbrance from $4,496 to $3,332. This payment was made and indorsed on the bond and mortgage which secured the amount of the purchase money payable to O. and L. as they came of age, leaving due thereon $1,500. S. one of the guardians having died, M., as surviving guardian, took a new mortgage of that date (1875) from the then owner of the premises for the $1,832, and assigned the other mortgage to Cole for $1,500. He thus voluntarily surrendered the first lien, and lost all control thereof, and made the other mortgage a second lien. The interest was paid on the Cole mortgage until 1877; and not being paid thereafter, it was foreclosed. The lands were sold for $1,500. Thus the balance, $1,832, due to M. as guardian is lost, unless M. is personally liable. The bill seeks to charge him with such liability. His bondsmen are brought in.

The answer avers good faith. M. swears that he acted not only in good faith but under the advice of counsel. The argument in behalf of M. is that although the money was well secured in 1868, yet long before it became due there was such depreciation in values that the security was doubtful; and that this was so notwithstanding the payment of $1,164 in 1875. This being so, it is said that the sale and assignment to Cole, of the old mortgage for $1,500, and securing to him a preference over the mortgage for $1,832, by taking a new mortgage for that amount, did not alter or affect the rights of M. as guardian, or of his wards, since he had the same security that he held before; that is, altering the securities did not increase or diminish the value of the land.

This perhaps is the turning point in the case. Were not his rights or interests as guardian, affected and altered by this surrender and change of securities, notwithstanding the value of the land remained the same? It is true the same amount and no more remained as a lien upon the premises. But was it of no value to have the control of the first mortgage? Do not all business men seek such control? Is it of no value to be able to say whether in such case there shall be a foreclosure or not, and a sale or not? Has not many a doubtful claim been satisfied in full by prudence and good management? Manifestly it is of great value to have control of the first mortgage.

But it is said the court must judge of these things by results; that in this case the premises were offered at public sale by the sheriff, and that every effort was made to secure the highest price and that they sold for only $1,500, having sold nine years before for $5,496. Yes, it is true that the course pursued produced such a result. But, accepting this method of reasoning, it will at once appear most unfortunate that we know not and cannot know what would have resulted had the guardian retained his securities and foreclosed (if that became necessary) on his own account, or had called upon this court, from whence he derived his authority, for instructions and aid in the matter.

When courts of equity are asked to accept results and to ratify them, it must appear very clearly that the result reached is the most favorable. If there exists a reasonable probability that a different course might have secured a more advantageous result, I cannot understand how a court of conscience can close its eyes to such fact, and relieve a trustee from liability and cast the loss on an innocent cestui que trust. It seems to me that the reasoning of defendant's counsel is fallacious; and to stand upon it would be an abuse of a very salutary rule.

But is there not a most reasonable probability, indeed, do not the facts show that very much more than $1,500 might have been realized on this security had M. retained the original lien intact? Just group the principal facts and consider whether or not they do not so strike the understanding with unremitting force, turn them as one will.

The lands were sold for $5,496; in cash $1,000 had been paid; M. and S., two able, competent and interested men, under the obligations of an oath and in full view of their legal and moral obligations, accepted mortgages for the balance ($4,496) on the land sold; the interest was paid until 1875, when $1,164 more of the principal was paid, leaving only $3,332 still due; it was only necessary to realize a trifle over $38 per acre (there being 99.93 acres) to secure the balance due, for lands which they had sold for $54 per acre; M. allowed this same tract to be sold for $1,500; and at the time of that sale it is shown by the witnesses called by M. that it was worth from $2,000 to $2,500. Hence, that the result would have been different under a wise management by the guardian himself is placed beyond speculation. With such a showing can any court justify the guardian and say that his ward should bear the loss rather than he? I conclude not.

The charge is made in the bill that, in making this change of securities, the guardian acted in his own interest and not in that of the ward, which, it is claimed, is shown by the fact that he used the money received from Cole to answer his own personal ends. M. does not meet this charge in his answer; and in his evidence he supports the charge by saying that he thinks he did not use it all. This fact tends very strongly to raise the belief that he was acting more in his own behalf than of his wards.

Again; the guardian makes an effort to excuse his conduct and fix the responsibility for the present situation, by showing that he made investments of money in a house and lot, at the request of his wards and their grandmother, that they might have a home together, at an expense of about $1,500, which the infants promised to accept a deed for on arriving at age, but which they now refuse to do. Such transactions, however honest or well meant, are wholly unavailing. And this circumstance is only an additional proof of the great wisdom of the rule which seldom if ever tolerates any such dealings between guardian and ward, without the sanction of the court first being had.

I will advise a decree according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

Caroline LOREE

v.

William J. LEWIS et al.

Where tenants in common join in a mortgage of the premises held in common to secure a debt incurred by one of them only, the interests of the others are bound thereby; and this effect of the instrument cannot be overcome by parol. The court can, however, order a sale of the interest of the debtor tenant in common first.

(Filed October 9, 1886.)

ON bill to foreclose a mortgage. Decree of sale advised.

The facts of the case and the questions raised are set forth in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. W. Cutler, for complainant:

In construction of law the mortgagors were equally liable to pay this mortgage. The incumbrance rested equally on the property of each.

Lavaletta v. Thompson, 2 Beas. 276.

Loree had a right to rely upon the face of the mortgage and the record of the same, for his information as to the security he was about to take and for the amount of equity that said Lewis had in the same.

7 Johns. Ch. 16.

No secret trust and agreement, entered into or existing between the mortgagors, can affect the rights of the holder of the mortgage. An innocent purchaser is not liable to a latent equity of which he was ignorant.

Reilly v. Mayers, 1 Beas. 59.

A mortgagee is a purchaser of the mortgaged premises within the intent and meaning of the law.

Ledyard v. Butler, 9 Paige, 132.

Mr. James H. Neighbor, for defendants: This case is governed by Danbury v. Robinson, 1 McCarter, 219.

An assignee of bond and mortgage takes them subject to the equities existing between the original parties.

See Stewart's N. J. Digest, p. 776, § 230; Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481; Garrick v. Sherman, 2 Halst. Ch. 219; Rose v. Kimball, 16 N. J. Eq. 185.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The defendants to this bill to foreclose are a brother and two sisters, the owners in fee, as tenants in common, of the lands mortgaged. The brother borrowed of Mrs. W. $1,600 and gave his bond; and he and his sisters gave the mortgage in suit on said lands, as further security. Mrs. W. assigned the bond and mortgage to the complainant, who is a daughter of L. the real debtor. One of the defendants, by her answer, insists that she had no interest in the said transaction, beyond securing the loan; and that this fact was well known and understood by the complainant when she accepted the assignment of the mortgage; and that this being so, the complainant cannot enforce the claim under the mortgage, against the interest of said answering defendant, in the land.

Supposing that the complainant knew all the facts; is there anything in the case to discharge her from her liability as surety? For I can see no other principle involved than that which arises between creditor and surety. The testimony satisfies me that the husband of complainant advanced and paid a full consideration for the mortgage, and caused it to be assigned to the complainant. But independently of the question of consideration, in my judgment, the defense entirely fails. The defendant voluntarily joined in the execution of the mortgage to secure the claim. There is no deception nor any pretense of it set up or shown. It is true, something is said in the answer, to the effect that the sister's interest was not, after all, to be bound. But she gave the mortgage and thereby bound her interest, and this cannot be overcome by parol. The title of Mrs. Wood was perfect; she could have enforced her claim against all the tenants in common. All these rights she could assign; and just as well or perfectly without consideration as by gift, or for their highest cash value. The defendant could no more question the rights of the donee, in such case, than she could those of the donor.

In my judgment, all that the court can do is to order the interest of William J. Lewis, the principal debtor, sold first; and in case that does not produce enough to satisfy the claim, that then the balance be sold. I believe there is no dispute as to the amount due.

The complainant is entitled to a decree accordingly, with costs.

The question being whether one who had received a promissory note, made by a principal debtor and sureties, on paying certain judgments against the principal debtor (to the rights under which as against land of the debtor he became subrogated) took such note as additional to the claims under said judgments, with the right of applying it on other claims held by him against said debtor; or whether such note was merely collateral to the claims under said judgments; held, that the note was collateral only, and that, after the payee therein had been reimbursed for his payments on said judgments, he should be restrained from proceeding, under a judgment recovered by him on said note, against land of a surety thereon.

(Filed October 13, 1886.)

BILL for injunction to restrain proceedings under a judgment, and to cancel the same. Decree advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. J. G. Shipman & Son, for complainant.

Mr. Henry S. Harris, for defendant Keyser:

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

In 1872, Henry E. B. was indebted to several. J. L. had claims against him for over $3,000, which had been secured by bond and mortgage and perfected by final decree. A. W. C. had a judgment for over $250. And Mrs. K. had a judgment for over $200. Mr. Keyser, the defendant, insists that at that same time he held a claim of over $1,700.

The land of said Henry E. B. was advertised for sale by virtue of the executions issued upon said decree and judgments, when he applied to G. K. the defendant, for help in the premises, which G. K. undertook to render. There was a meeting of G. K., Henry E. B., his brother Adam W. B., and John D. Snyder, since deceased. It is agreed that G. K. was not willing to aid Henry E. B. unless he could have collateral security for at least a portion of the amount which he should either pay or become liable for. The dispute is whether that collateral security was for so much in addition to all other security or whether it was collateral only to the claims of J. L., A. W. C. and Mrs. K. G. K. insists on the former, and the complainant on the latter.

The complainant insists that G. K. agreed to become responsible for the above named claims, providing Henry E. B. would give him collateral security for the costs and interest due on said decree up to April 1, 1872, and $250 of the amount of the A. W. C. judgment, and $200 of the amount due on the Mrs. K. judgment. The complainant says that this was the understanding of the parties interested.

These claims, i. e., the interest to April 1, 1872, on said decree and both of said judgments, amounted to $1,421.62. For this sum the said debtor Henry E. B., Adam W. B., and John D. Snyder gave their promissory note to G. K., and at the same time G. K. gave J. L. his note for the whole amount of principal, interest and costs due on said decree, and accepted an assignment of said decree from J. L.

In 1874 and before these claims were all paid by Henry E. B.; said G. K. recovered judgment on said note given by Henry E. B., Adam W. B., and John D. Snyder. After this judgment, the said John D. Snyder died. The said J. L. became his administrator. On application the orphans' court made an order for him to sell lands for the payment of debts. All the lands of the decedent were advertised and sold. The complainant, on being assured by J. L. that she would buy a clear title, purchased. Others also purchased. G. K. neither presented any claim to J. L. as such administrator, nor did he in any way warn purchasers that he relied upon the said lands to satisfy his judgment. In 1878, J. L. as such administrator executed and delivered deeds to the purchasers for the lands sold and the purchasers took possession.

On the 29th of April, 1885, G. K. had realized from the lands so incumbered, of the principal debtor Henry E. B., sums equal to the whole amount of said judgment, less the sum of $450. This sum J. L. tendered to G. K., with the impression that G. K. had no first claim for any larger sum against the estate of John D. Snyder or his lands. G. K. declined the tender and issued execution upon his judgment and advertised said lands, so conveyed to complainant and others, for sale. He claims the whole amount of said judgment. The complainant asks for an injunction to restrain G. K. from proceeding, and to compel him to cancel his judgment as to John D. Snyder's estate on payment of said $450.

There is no doubt about the amount of cash G. K. has received. The question is whether it should be applied to this judgment or not, and the judgment ordered to be canceled upon the payment of the said $450. G. K., as above stated, maintains that he has a right to apply these moneys to other claims which he holds against Henry E. B., as the note upon which he took judgment against Henry E. B., Adam W. B. and John D. Snyder was general and not confined to any certain claims.

Let us trace the main features of the case. The makers of said note, so far as appears (according to the weight of testimony), understood that the security was collateral to the lien already had by virtue of the decree and the two judgments. The decree and the judgments bound the lands of Henry E. B. In addition to this, Henry E. B. gave said note with sureties, for the interest and costs on the decree, and for the amount of the judgments as stated. All the money realized by said G. K. was out of these lands on which he had these liens by decree and judgments against Henry E. B. It nowhere appears that he ever appropriated any of said moneys to the satisfaction of his other claims against Henry E. B., which had he done, I think would not be equitable for him to do in such case. But he did take a large amount of other securities from Henry E. B. for the other claims he held against him, which he still holds, or at least on which he has not realized. In other words, he has never accounted for these securities, as other creditors have a right to insist that he shall. These undisputed facts, of themselves, strongly incline the mind to the complainant's view of the case.

And I think the defendant, G. K. fastens himself to this same view, in his explanation of what passed at the time the note was given. I give his own words when asked to tell about the taking of this note as collateral security: "Well, there was Mrs. Kinnon's judgment and Mr. Crevelings, and some $900 of Mr. Lamerson, for interest and costs, and another account he had against Mr. Burd; and I told them that if they gave me collateral security to the amount of them, their claims, then I would pay the whole debt, and I done so; not for the amount, but to the amount; that was the word."

This effort to shift responsibility is entirely unavailing. Considering the subject matter, I am unable to make any distinction, even in a technical sense, between the words "to" and "for." The interview was with reference to the liens of L., C. and Mrs. K. And beyond refutation, a certain amount of these, in dollars and cents was to be further secured. It seems to me quite idle to say that such security did not and could not apply to those claims but was only applicable to other claims of G. K., because he said at the negotiations "If they gave me collateral security to the amount," and not for the amount.

I will advise a decree according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

SUPREME COURT.

STATE, John REYNOLDS et al., Prosecutors,
v.

Mayor and Aldermen of the CITY OF PATERSON.

Taxes assessed, under section 131 of the charter of Paterson, at a fixed rate per lineal foot of street frontage, based upon the estimated cost of sewers in the drainage district are invalid, because neither assessed according to the true value of the property, nor imposed within the limits of special benefits derived from the improvement.

(Decided October 6, 1886.)

ON certiorari. Tax vacated nisi.

Argued at June Term, 1886, before Dixon, J., by consent of parties.

Statement by Dixon, J.:

The writ in this case brings up for review certain taxes called sewer taxes, assessed upon the lands of the prosecutors, in the City of Paterson, in and for the year 1885.

These taxes were assessed under and in pursuance of and according to the 131st section of the present charter of said City, passed in 1871, as amended in 1874. Laws 1871, p. 860; Laws 1874, p. 467.

The 131st section of said charter reads as follows:

"That on or before the second Monday in June, in the year 1871, and annually thereafter, it shall be the duty of the board of estimates and assessments to estimate the average cost per lineal foot, of all sewers and drains constructed in the several drainage districts of said City, subsequently to the year 1868, and up to the time of making such annual estimate; and to transmit a certified statement of such estimate to the department of finance; and in making the annual enumerations, valuations and assessments for taxes in such year the commissioners of assessment and revision of taxes shall, in a separate column of their assessment books, assess upon each lot fronting on or adjoining a street through which a sewer or drain has been constructed up to that time, a sum per lineal foot of frontage, equal to $8\frac{1}{4}$ per centum of the average cost per lineal foot of all sewers and drains constructed subsequently to the year 1868 in the drainage district wherein such lot is situated, estimated as aforesaid."

Meers. Geo. S. Hilton and H. A. Williams, for prosecutors:

The general principle is well established that taxation, as far as practicable, must be equal and uniform, even where there is no express constitutional provision to that effect.

Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 495, 501; Dill Mun. Corp. § 587; State v. Readington, 7 Vroom, 66, 70; State v. Fuller, 10 Vroom, 576, 578; 11 Vroom, 615.

This applies to assessments for local improvements as well as to any other species of taxation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 499; Williams, Tax. p. 357.

Here there is a clear case of taking private property for public use without just compensation, and it is therefore in violation of the principles enunciated in the opinion of the court of errors and appeals in the Agens Case, 8 Vroom, 415.

See also State v. Fuller, 5 Vroom, 227, 578, 579.

The statute does not limit these taxes to the special benefits conferred on the property assessed by the improvements, on account of which they are assessed or required thereby to be assessed, in proportion to such benefits; and it is therefore unconstitutional.

State v. Newark, 8 Vroom, 415; State v. Chamberlin, 8 Vroom, 388; State v. Fuller, 5 Vroom, 227; 11 Vroom, 615; Vreeland v. Jersey City, 14 Vroom, 185; 688; Culver v. Jersey City, 16 Vroom, 256.

All taxes that are not assessed upon the property benefited to the extent only of and in proportion to such benefits, must be assessed upon the entire political district, which in this case is the City of Paterson and not upon merely a portion thereof, or certain specified or selected property therein. Cases cited above.

A law providing for separate and distinct taxing districts in a city cannot be sustained.

State v. Chamberlin, 8 Vroom, 388; State v. Fuller, 5 Vroom, 227; 11 Vroom, 615.

A law providing for a tax to be laid according to an arbitrary rule, fixed therein by the Legislature, which does not regard either the value of the property assessed or the principle of uniformity in taxation is unconstitutional.

Jersey City v. Vreeland, 14 Vroom, 688; Culver v. Jersey City, 16 Vroom, 256.

Mr. Francis Scott, for defendant.

Dixon, J., delivered the following opinion: These taxes cannot be sustained. As ordinary property taxes, they are in conflict with article IV, sec. VII, par. 12 of the State Constitution, inasmuch as they are not assessed according to the true value of the property. As improvement assessments, they are invalid because not imposed for and within the limits of special benefits derived from the improvement. Jersey City v. Vreeland, 14 Vroom, 688.

The case agreed upon does not show the existence of any facts which warrant the inference that the property owners have entered into a contract with the City to pay the sums assessed in consideration of the use of the sewers, so as to bring the case within the decision in Vreeland v. Jersey City, 10 Stew. 574.

Hence the taxes must be adjudged illegal, and I think the prosecutors should be awarded their costs, since there was no other mode of redress for them than by these proceedings.

Whether the property in question has ever been assessed for these sewers, or whether there is any legislation justifying its taxation or assessment therefor is not made clear, so as to call for the exercise of the power of the court under the Act of March 23, 1881 (P. L. 1881, p. 194); but if the city authorities shall be advised that they are entitled to some redress by reason of that statute, application therefor may be made to the supreme court during its coming term.

In case no such application be made, a rule may be entered setting aside the taxes now under review, with costs.

*If, under an order for discovery in aid of execution, an examination of witnesses be held without personal notice to the defendant, the proceedings will be set aside as irregular.

(Decided September 9, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings under an order for discovery in aid of execution. Proceedings set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued February Term, 1886, before Depue, Reed and Dixon, JJ.

Mr. Harris, for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. Shipman, for defendants in certiorari.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court: An order for discovery in aid of execution out of the Warren Common Pleas was made November 25, 1884. It directed the defendant to appear and make discovery on November 28, 1884, at 10 o'clock A. M. It was filed on the day of its allowance and on the following day a copy of it was delivered to the defendant's wife at his residence in Warren County. The defendant was not then at home, and did not return home until November 29, 1884, nor was he in any way apprised of the purport of the order before the time set therein for his appearance. At the time so specified, the plaintiffs in execution produced witnesses who were examined before the designated commissioner; and, upon the testimony thus taken without notice to the defendant, a receiver was appointed and proceedings against the defendant, for contempt, were instituted. The certiorari brings up the whole matter for review.

The defendant was entitled to notice of the examination of witnesses; and, no other mode of notifying him being provided by statute, personal notice was requisite. For want of this, the proceedings were irregular; Seifert v. Edison, 18 Vroom, 428 [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 464]; and must be set aside, with costs.

Mayor and Aldermen of the CITY OF PAT-ERSON.

1. It seems that the general principle, that where an officer is required by law to perform a duty involving the disbursement of money out of pocket he must be reimbursed, should be applied to the case of the mayor of a city seeking reimbursement from the city, for his expenditures in resisting successfully an application for a mandamus against him, made on behalf of the city to compel his official action in aid of an illegal corporate enterprise.
2. When neither the charter of a municipal corporation nor a general law of the State provides to the contrary, a majority of the board of aldermen of the corporation constitutes a quorum; and the vote of a majority of those present, there being a quorum, is all that is required for the adoption or passage of a motion or the doing of any other act the board has power to do.

(Decided Oct. 13, 1886.)

CASE certified from the Passaic Circuit Court.
Action to recover for moneys expended by plaintiff when Mayor of the City of Paterson in defense of a suit against him as such Mayor. Judgment for plaintiff advised.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The Board of Aldermen could have caused this claim to be paid.

State v. Hammonon, 9 Vroom, 430.

A mayor, by virtue of the provisions of the charter, which make it the duty of the Mayor of this City to be vigilant and active in causing the laws of the State to be executed and enforced, etc., has the legal capacity to institute and maintain, even in his own name, as such mayor, suits to prohibit the passage or execution of ordinances or resolutions contrary to the charter, and to test their legality; also, to institute and maintain suits to prohibit or restrain the officers of the City from doing any acts contrary

NOTE.—As the exact question presented in this case is new, the following authorities are noted as bearing upon it, in addition to those cited in briefs of counsel and opinion of the court.

The expense of an act required to be done by the charter is chargeable to the municipal corporation. Tucker v. Trustees of Rochester, 7 Wend. 254.

The English Parliament, recognizing that officers were subject to be prosecuted by mandamus and that they would legally have to bear their own expense, passed the Statute, 1 Wm. IV. chap. 21, R. 4, which provides that "Such officers should in certain cases be protected against the payment of damages or costs;" and therefore it provides that the real parties in interest shall come in and defend and have the benefit of success, in costs, etc.

2 Add. Torts, p. 755, § 1512.

Public moneys cannot be appropriated to pay for defense of an officer, forced into a lawsuit, for doing his duty.

1 Dill. p. 174, § 147, notes, etc.

The case of Bradley v. Hammon-ton, 9 Vroom, 480, holds that the town has the power to pay an officer's disbursement if it so chooses; but does not decide that it must pay in any event.

In State v. Freeholders of Hudson Co. 8 Vroom, 254, it is held that the board could pay even more than they could be held for in an action at law.

The general doctrine as stated in other States is as follows, to wit: 4 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 407.

A municipal corporation may legally indemnify an officer, acting in good faith, for a loss incurred in the discharge of his official duty; but the duty must have been one authorized or imposed by law, and the matter one in which the corporation had an interest.

Gregory v. Bridgeport, 41 Conn. 76; State, Bradley v. Hammon-ton, 88 N. J. L. 420; Sherman v. Carr, 8 R. I. 431.

A municipal corporation has no right to assume the defense of an action to which it is a party; it has no interest in resisting.

Halestead v. Mayor of N. Y. 5 Barb. 218 (N. Y.) The charter, § 24, P. L. 1871, p. 817, says: "No additional allowance beyond the legal claims, which exist for any services on its account or in its employment, shall ever be passed by the Board of Aldermen except by a unanimous vote," etc.

Knapp, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case, upon an agreed state of facts, is certified to this court for its advisory opinion.

The plaintiff's claim is for money expended by him when Mayor of the City of Paterson, to defray his reasonable costs and expenses in defending himself as such mayor, in a proceeding taken by or in behalf of the City, to obtain mandatory process compelling the plaintiff, as such Mayor, to join in the execution of certain bonds which the City was about to issue.

The plaintiff here was successful in his defense to that proceeding. This court justified the refusal of the Mayor to act as therein required, upon the ground that such refusal properly resisted the consummation of a corporate enterprise, illegally begun by other constituted authorities. The first question here is whether necessary, reasonable expenditures in such a discharge of public, official duty laid the ground for legal claim against the City. The right of the corporation to indemnify an officer for losses and expenses incurred in the discharge of an official duty, in a matter in which the corporation is interested, is supported by repeated adjudications. Lewis v. Freeholders of Hudson, 8 Vroom, 254; State v. Hammon-ton, 9 Vroom, 384.

But such indemnity may be granted to one not possessed of a right at law to enforce his claim. It does not therefore suffice for this claim that the City might lawfully repay him. The plaintiff's claim cannot be rested solely upon the ground that he was successful in a suit in which he and the defendant were opposing litigants, for all his rights as such litigant against his opponent would be determined and adjusted in the resulting judgment. Hall v. Leaming, 2 Vroom, 321.

His costs of suit would be the measure of his redress. His claim, if recoverable at all, must be based on relations with the defendant other than those of an opposing litigant.

The expenditure which he seeks to be repaid must have been made under some authority lawfully conferred upon him by the City, or subsequently recognized, or in virtue of some provision of the character or general rule of law. The city authorities had not authorized the employment of counsel. No provision in the charter expressed power in the Mayor to employ counsel at the City's expense; and on this branch of the case appeal must be made to the general law.

The implied liability of corporations of this nature is generally restricted to cases where the City obtains money or property of others by mistake or without authority of law, and appropriates such money or property under such circumstances that the general law imposes the obligation to pay in order to do justice. For services rendered voluntarily or under an unauthorized contract, or for money voluntarily paid for its use, no liability arises; the law will not raise the volunteer to the position of a creditor.

But this case is peculiar and I think exceptional. The Mayor, as head officer of the City, occupied a position of public trust. It was his duty under the charter "to be vigilant and active in causing the ordinances of the City and the laws of the State to be executed and enforced; and, as far as possible, to promote efficient government in the City."

The proceeding taken in the name of the City against him, which gave rise to the expenditure sued for, was to compel him to a course of official action which he deemed violative of law and detrimental to the interests of the City. To make proper defense service of counsel was necessary. If he was right in his judgment, the City should have furnished him the aid of proper counsel. But the official law officer was in court against him, and the city authorities to whom, ordinarily, he should have applied, were the real actors in the proceeding against him. It would under these circumstances have been idle to make the application. Ordinarily his duty would have ended with an unsuccessful application to the official counsel; or, if the city counsel were not available, then by application to the appropriate authority to furnish other counsel; but he could not expect aid from either source in the existing situation. He was chargeable with the knowledge of his official duty and was called upon then to decide what was the course of action which that duty demanded of him. The risk of decision was upon him. If he erred in judgment as to his legal duty in resisting the proceeding he must, on demanding to be reimbursed his outlay, have stood as a mere volunteer and borne the direct consequences of defeat. The judgment of the court which the parties invoked vindicated his decision, and found him acting in obedience to the commands of the charter.

I do not think the Mayor's duty would have been discharged by silent submission to the action of the court, on the rule to show cause why the mandamus should not issue against him. But had he remained silent then, when the alternate writ came he would have been required to make return to it and the same services of counsel would have then been indispensable. The City is at no loss because he met the matter at the threshold.

The claim to be indemnified for his expenditures, the entire benefit of which the City received, seems to me to be eminently just, and presents a strong case for relief in some mode. I think in its behalf the general principle of law may be invoked: that where an officer is required by law to perform a duty involving the disbursement of money out of pocket he must be reimbursed. The proper and only fund out of which it may be done in the plaintiff's case is that of the City, in whose behalf as its officer and for whose benefit he acted.

The rules which circumscribe and limit the implied liability of municipal corporations are designed in the law as shields against the imposition of false claims, and to guard against extravagance in administration. It would be a strange perversion of their purpose to convert them into means to deter faithful public officers from honest effort to guard and protect public trusts confided to their care.

But if this ground of recovery be regarded as untenable or doubtful, I think the action of the city authorities has been such as to raise this into an express promise to pay, and that upon valuable consideration. The bill, on being presented to the Board of Aldermen, was by proper resolution referred to the committee on finance and by that board reported for payment. This department of finance is not a mere subdivision of the council but is a statutory organization, with independent powers conferred by the charter. Its power is to settle and adjust all claims in favor of or against the Corporation. State v. Paterson, 10 Vroom, 489, 494.

The charter provides that the comptroller shall, when so ordered by the Board of Aldermen, draw warrants on the city treasurer for the payment of claims. § 67 P. L. 1871, p. 836.

The claim having been settled and adjusted by the department of the city government authorized to perform that duty, the order of the Board of Aldermen upon the comptroller was the remaining requisite for the issuing of a warrant on the treasurer for payment. On the presentation of the report to the Board of Aldermen at a regular meeting, at which fifteen members were present, on a motion that the report be received and adopted and the comptroller draw his warrant on the treasurer for payment, eight of the members so present voted in the affirmative.

The whole membership of the Board consisted of sixteen. The charter provides that a majority of the whole number of members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. § 22.

It is denied that this passed the order of payment, on the ground that the Board of Aldermen had adopted among its rules one which provides that no resolution, by-law or ordinance, shall be passed without a concurring vote of at least nine members; and if they involve the expenditure of money, they shall require the votes of two thirds of the whole members of the Board. There are various provisions in the charter declaring the number of votes required in specified cases; but there is no part of the charter which provides for the number requisite to order payment of a claim passed upon by the finance committee.

The true rule in such a case I think is correctly stated in the brief of the counsel of plaintiff.

When the charter of a municipal corporation or a general law of the State does not provide to the contrary, a majority of the board of aldermen constitutes a quorum; and the vote of a majority of those present, there being a quorum, is all that is required for the adoption or passage of a motion, or the doing of any other act the board has power to do. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 278, 283; Wells v. Rahway Rubber Co. 4 C. E. Green, 404.

Under the twenty-third section of the charter the Board is given power to establish its own rules of procedure. But I do not think that under this power it was designed to confer upon the Board the adoption of a rule changing either the general law or any special provision in the charter. Power to make such rules and by-laws was inherent in the Corporation without this provision. Such by-laws must be in accordance with the charter or the general rules of law. The charter is silent and the general law requires a majority vote. Taylor v. Griswold, 2 Green, 228.

Official action which affects the rights of third persons or the public must be taken and manifested in the mode pointed out by law.

I think it of no moment that the Board of Aldermen determined under its rule that the resolution and order to pay failed in its passage. The court will look at what it did, and determine the legal result of its action.

The Circuit Court should be advised that the plaintiff is entitled to recover his claim.

(Decided October 18, 1886.)

ON certiorari to review a judgment of the Essex Common Pleas, affirming a judgment of the Newark District Court. Affirmed.

Argued before Depue, Reed and Dixon, JJ.

Mr. Wm. G. Cumming, for prosecutor.

Mr. Abner Kalisch, for defendants.

Counsel for the prosecutor bases his third reason for reversal (that the judge of the district court, after a motion of nonsuit, permitted an amendment by the addition of a coplaintiff) upon the theory that section 138 of the Practice Act is not applicable to the district court, and that said section was, by force of section 301 of the Practice Act only applicable to the court of common pleas in cases on appeal from justices "where the facts are again presented by testimony." An examination of sections 118 and 138 of the Justice Court Act,

*Head notes by Dixon, J.

Rev. 1876, pp. 559, 563, will show that he is mistaken.

Section 113 of the Justice Court Act reads: "The provisions of the 188th section of an Act entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Practice of the Courts of Law' are hereby extended to the courts constituted by this Act and to the courts of common pleas on an appeal taken thereto; Provided, That if any objections be made before the justice by either party in any cause, upon the return day or upon the trial or hearing of the same, to any process or pleading in respect to any matter which might be amended by the justice under the provisions of said section of said Act, and no such amendment shall be made before the conclusion of the trial or hearing, then it shall not be in the power of the court of common pleas, on the trial of the appeal, to amend or to order amended the said process or pleading in respect of any of the matters to which such objections shall relate or were made."

This section 113 is designated as section 105 of Nixon's Digest, 1868, title, Justices' Courts, and which received construction in Craft v. Smith, 6 Vroom, 305, 306.

Section 138 of the Justice Court Act (Rev. 1876, p. 563) reads: "The provisions of this Act shall apply to the District Courts of the City of Newark, except where the provisions hereof are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act constituting said courts and of the supplements thereto."

And section 5 of the Special District Court Act (Laws 1873, p. 246), after referring to various Acts conferring jurisdiction upon justices of the peace, reads: "And said Acts, and all other Acts which modify said Acts, shall apply to said courts, and regulate the practice and proceedings thereof, except where they conflict with the provisions of this Act."

Thus it is easily to be seen that by statutory enactments section 138 of the Practice Act applies with full force to the District Courts of the City of Newark.

A recent construction of section 138 of the Practice Act is to be found in Farrier v. Schroeder, 11 Vroom, 601, where it was held that the power to amend under section 138 of the Practice Act extends to the amending the record at the trial, and, after motion to nonsuit, by striking out the name of the plaintiff, wherever it occurs in the process and pleadings, and inserting the name of another person as plaintiff.

The addition therefore of a coplaintiff was no error.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first reason for reversal is that the action in the district court was in the form of trespass on the case when it should have been trespass. This objection was not presented below. Had it been, an amendment could have been made, under the authority of section 5 of the Newark District Courts Act (P. L. 1873, p. 245), section 2 of the supplement to the Small Cause Act, approved February 6, 1858 (P. L. 1858, p. 33) and section 46 of the Practice Act (Nix. Dig. p. 739). The proceedings may now be amended. American Life Ins. Co. v. Day, 10 Vroom, 89.

The next reason for reversal is that in the district court the judge ruled that the following testimony would not warrant the jury in finding that a written lease was changed by a subsequent agreement of the parties, so as to make the monthly rent under the lease payable in advance. "After the lease was signed, the lessor said to the lessee: 'Mr. Winkler, I expect my rent on the first of the month;' the lessee said, 'very well.' Rent was paid on April 1, and May 2 (May 1 being Sunday)."

We think the ruling was correct, assuming that this testimony shows a promise by the lessee to pay the rent in advance; yet such promise appears to have been nudum pactum. The rights of the parties were already fixed by the written lease, and there was nothing, either of benefit to the promisor or of detriment to the promisee, beyond the mutual obligations established by the lease, to stand as consideration for the oral promise. Therefore it did not legally modify the contract previously made. Nightingale ads. Meginnis, 5 Vroom, 461; Conover v. Stillwell, 5 Vroom, 54.

The last reason to be noticed is that when, during the trial in the district court, it appeared that the original plaintiff's wife was a part owner of the goods, for the destruction of which the suit was brought, and it was moved to nonsuit the plaintiff because his wife did not join in the action, the court refused to nonsuit and permitted the wife to be joined as coplaintiff. We think the amendment was within the authority conferred by the statutes above mentioned. Farrier v. Schroeder, 11 Vroom, 601.

Besides, it did not in the least affect the merits of the suit. The husband, being in possession of the goods as an owner, at the time of the trespass by the defendant, a stranger to the title, had himself the right of recovering all the damages resulting from the injury done. Luse v. Jones, 10 Vroom, 707.

The judgment of the Common Pleas should be affirmed.

v.

George GROLL.

*The owner of the fee in an alley way over which is a right of way may erect a building over said way, if in so doing he does not interfere with the right of way.

(Filed October 9, 1886.)

ON bill for injunction. Dismissal of bill advised.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. M. Snyder, for complainant.

Mr. T. B. Harned, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The owner of a plot of ground laid it out in lots. The plot was bounded on two sides by open streets. On the rear of the lots fronting on C Street he opened an alley way leading to the other street, D. G. purchased both the lot on the corner, fronting on C Street extending along D Street to the said alley, and also the lot on the other side of the said alley, on D Street; so that G. owned both sides of the alley.

By his title deeds, G. has the fee in the alley way. By virtue of his deed S. claims the unobstructed use of this alley way from D Street to reach the rear of his lot. And there is no dispute between the parties but that S. has by purchase all the rights which anyone claiming such easement under such a title is entitled to.

Groll has erected a building on both of his lots, the walls of which abut the sides or lines of this alleyway. These walls are carried up ten feet, and at that elevation Groll has commenced the work of joining the two buildings, thus of course preventing all use of the space occupied by the building. Sutton asks that Groll may be enjoined.

What, therefore, is included in the ordinary grant of a right of way, commonly called an alley way? The complainant relies on Kana v. Bolton, 9 Stew. 21.

So far as the right to an easement entered into the controversy in that case, it was not decided that building over or across it, six feet above the ground, was or was not an obstruction. Nor can I find any case which supports the claim of the complainant. But so far as the question has been considered by the courts, the cases are against the complainant. In Massachusetts the owner of an adjoining tenement, who had the fee in the soil over which was a way, built over the way at an elevation of eleven feet; the court held that it was lawful for him to do so. Gerish v. Shattuck, 182 Mass. 235. See also Atkins v. Bordman, 2 Met. 457.

In the case before me it appears that in describing the property the way is referred to, and that following the description are these words: "Together with the appurtenances, and also the free and joint use of said five feet three and a half inch wide joint alley for ingress and egress forever." There is nothing to show any special use intended. Only the usual and ordinary rights conferred upon a grantee can be taken into an account in such case. What are those rights? Only the right of ingress and egress upon the surface of the soil; not beneath the surface, not above the surface, at such elevation as he may elect. He could not construct an underground way or a drain or other openings. He could not construct an elevated way in order to reach his lot or dwelling or any part thereof. His rights are confined to and upon the surface of the soil.

Not so limited are the rights of the owner of the fee. He has only conveyed the right to the use of the surface. All other rights of ownership, not inconsistent therewith, he retains and may exercise. If he does not interfere with the right of way, he may use the subsoil, or go beneath the surface for any purpose; and so, undoubtedly, he may appropriate the space above the surface. Below the surface he has imposed no barrier; and above, none except the right of way; and with this exception all other rights are as perfect as they can be.

Does the erection of a structure over said way, at an elevation of nine or ten feet, interfere with or obstruct the right of the complainant to ingress and egress? I think not. There is nothing in the case to show that when he purchased his lot he intended to engage in anything that would suffer by the proposed erection; nor that he has since undertaken anything which cannot so well be done; so that I can find nothing in the present situation nor in any of the attending circumstances at or since the grant which calls for the interference of this court.

I think the injunction should be denied and the bill should be dismissed, with costs.

NOTE.—This case is in harmony with the theory that the owner of land owns from the center of the earth upwards to the highest heavens. His grantee takes from him a title to be governed by the construction of the conveyance; if it be in fee, he takes the title of his grantor, but if the conveyance be simply that of a license, privilege or easement, the grantee would take only what would be reasonably implied in the grant.

Even the grant of an easement to the public, as a street or a highway (whether by dedication or deed) would not convey a fee in the soil but simply a right, the reasonable use of which would be protected by law, under police regulations alone, which make the wrongful obstruction of a public street a misdemeanor, punishable under the provisions of the criminal law.

So a structure which projects over a street of a city, as a cornice of a building, is a nuisance which the corporate authorities may abate; Grove v. Fort Wayne, 45 Ind. 429; as it is the duty of the authorities to keep the streets reasonably safe. Higert v. Greencastle, 48 Ind. 574.

In Bybee v. State, 94 Ind. 443, it is held that a bridge across a street, for private use, is an indictable nuisance, although it is so high above the surface as not to impede the passage of ordinary vehicles.

It is only figuratively speaking that the rights of the public, in a public street or highway, extend beneath the surface to the center of the earth and above its surface to the highest heavens, so that no person may wrongfully obstruct such public rights; and whether or not the particular structure erected or maintained obstructs or may obstruct wrongfully the public street or highway, is a question of fact for the jury. Bybee v. State, 94 Ind. 443; Grove v. Fort Wayne, 45 Ind. 429; S. C. 15 Am. Rep. 262; Centerville v. Woods, 57 Ind. 192; Logansport v. Dicks, 70 Ind. 85; S. C. 36 Am. Rep. 166.

If such be the law in relation to grants of easements to the public, restricting the rights of the public to the actual use intended, and the protection of that right, there seems to be no reason why the grant of a private right or easement, even under the rule of liberal construction in favor of the grantee, should not be restricted to the very terms of the grant.—[R. D.]

COURT OF APPEALS.

BALTIMORE & OHIO R. R. CO., Appt.,

v.

Peter F. LEAPLEY and Grace B. Leapley,
His Wife.

1. The agents of a carrier of passengers must observe the utmost care, proportionate to the age and condition of the passenger. They will be held to be able to distinguish a woman in an advanced state of pregnancy, and to know what would be safe or unsafe for her to do.
2. The failure of a railroad company to put a passenger, a woman advanced in pregnancy, off at the usual platform, without good reason, is an act of negligence for which such passenger can recover, if injured by reason thereof without fault on her part.
3. Negligence can not be imputed to a passenger, although a woman advanced in pregnancy, in jumping from a car to the ground in obedience to an instruction from the conductor, the train having been stopped at a place other than the usual platform.

(Decided June 22, 1886.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Washington County Circuit Court, in favor of plaintiffs in an action for damages for personal injuries to the wife caused by negligence of defendant Company. Affirmed.

The material errors alleged are the giving of plaintiff's second prayer for instructions and the refusal to give defendant's second, third and fourth prayers, which were as follows:

Plaintiff's second prayer—The plaintiff, by her counsel, prays the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence in the cause that the plaintiff, on the 16th day of February, 1884, purchased of the defendant's agent in Washington, D. C., a ticket which entitled her to be carried in one of the defendant's passenger cars on its railroad from Washington, D. C., to Tuscarora, a station on the Metropolitan Branch of said railroad in Frederick County, Maryland, and that the defendant had provided a platform at said station of Tuscarora for the safety of its passengers in alighting from its cars; that when the train upon which the said plaintiff was a passenger approached the said station of Tuscarora it slackened its speed and nearly stopped at said station, but that the said plaintiff was not allowed sufficient time and opportunity to get off said train on to said platform, and before giving the said plaintiff sufficient time to get off said train on to said platform, the said train moved on and went beyond said platform, and stopped at a point where the said defendant had provided no platform, or other means for the said plaintiff to safely alight from its said cars; and that the defendant's conductor or agent told the said plaintiff to get off said cars at said point, and at the same time defendant's said conductor or agent used harsh and profane language in the presence and hearing of said plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was excited and alarmed by the use of said language, and upon being told by said conductor or agent to get off said train, the plaintiff asked him "how," and that the said conductor in answer thereto, replied "jump," and that laboring under said excitement and alarm, the plaintiff did then and there get off said train, and in so getting off was thereby injured in one of her limbs, that then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action; and in assessing the damages to be allowed the plaintiff, the jury are to consider the health and condition of the plaintiff before the injury complained of, as compared with her present health and condition in consequence of said injury, and whether said injury is in its nature permanent; and also the mental and physical suffering to which she was and is subjected by reason of said injury; and to allow such damages as in their opinion will be a fair and just compensation for the injury which the plaintiff has sustained.

Defendant's second prayer—The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that if they find that the plaintiff Grace B. Leapley was a passenger with two children and five packages, on the train of the defendant from Washington to Tuscarora, on February 16, 1884, and that said train did not stop at Tuscarora, a regular station for said train, but did stop some distance from said station, and that she, (being a large woman, weighing 175 to 200 pounds, and in a state of pregnancy for the period of about five months) if the jury so find, did leap or jump from said train with a child two years old and two packages in her arms, a distance of about three feet, unaided by anyone, or without requesting anyone to aid her, and in consequence of said leap or jump was injured, then such act was negligence on her part, and she is not entitled to recover in this action, although the jury may find that she was told to jump by the conductor of said train.

Defendant's third prayer—The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that if they find that the plaintiff, Grace B. Leapley, did, by her own negligence and want of care, contribute to the injury she received in getting off the train, and for which this suit is brought (if the jury find that she was injured in getting off), then she is not entitled to recover in this action, and their verdict must be for the defendant.

Defendant's fourth prayer—The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that if they find from the evidence that the plaintiff Grace B. Leapley was a passenger on the train of the defendant, on the 16th day of February, 1884, from Washington City, to a station called Tuscarora, of which Eugene Hagan was the conductor; that when said train arrived at said station called Tuscarora, it stopped, but before the said plaintiff had sufficient time with her children and packages to get off the car in which she was riding, the said train started, and was again stopped about one hundred feet or thereabout from the platform at said station, when she appeared upon the platform of the car for the purpose of getting off the car then and there, and without being brought back to the platform of the station, if the jury so find, and that the said conductor and the brakeman of said train, at her instance, did assist her off the said car, and in doing so used all proper care and diligence, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, although they may find that she was injured in getting off.

Messrs. H. H. Keedy, John K. Cowen, and W. Irvine Cross, for appellant:

Plaintiff was under no obligation to act on the suggestion or direction of the conductor, nor was she justified in doing so, if it was clear that she thereby incurred great hazard.

Messrs. Fred J. Nelson and John C. Motter, for appellees:

In support of the plaintiffs' prayers counsel cite the following authorities:

Foy v. London, Brighton & S. C. R. Co. 18 C. B. N. S. 225; 11 Irish Com. L. N. S. 377; Thompson v. Belfast, Holyrood, etc. R. Co. 5 Irish Com. L. 517; *Delamaty v. Milr. & Prairie Du Chien R. R. The question whether the plaintiff's conduct on the occasion of the injury was wanting in reasonable prudence and caution, in view of all the circumstances, should have been submitted to the jury.

Holmes' Case, 39 Md. 243; Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506.

The evidence does not conclusively show a want of due care and prudence on her part, and should, therefore, have been properly left to the jury.

Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 512; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 107 Mass. 104.

What would be ordinary care in one case might be negligence in another, the relative degree of care, or want of it, depending upon the circumstances of each particular case.

McMahon v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 39 Md. 451.

The defendant's third prayer is a mere abstract and question of law; and as such was properly rejected.

Johns v. Marsh, 52 Md. 323.

Defendant's fourth prayer is based upon a hypothesis of which there is no evidence. The hypothesis of the prayer is that the conductor and the brakeman of said train, at her instance, did assist, etc.

Mayor of Balt. v. Trimble, 25 Md. 34.

The accident having happened, the presumption that the unusual mode substituted was a safe one is against the defendant; and the onus of proof is upon it. The prayer does not even submit to the jury the question of safety, vel non, of the mode selected.

Worthington's Case, 2 Md. 375; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Geis, 31 Md. 357; Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Andrews, 39 Md. 329.

If by this prayer it is sought to impute negligence to Mrs. Leapley in getting off the train, then all the circumstances surrounding her at the time should have been stated; such as her knowledge of the distance from the platform of the car to the ground; her pregnancy, rendering her liable to anxiety and nervousness, and her excitement and alarm caused by the language of defendant's agent.

Chaplin v. Hawes, 3 Carr. & P. 554; 126 Mass. 511.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Leapley, the plaintiff, was a passenger on the road of the defendant from Washington City to a place in Frederick County called Tuscarora, in February, 1884. She was a large woman, weighing from 175 to 200 pounds, and in a state of pregnancy for about five months. She had with her two children, aged respectively two and five years, and several bundles. She had duly paid her fare to Tuscarora, which was a regular stopping place for the train of defendant, and where there was the ordinary platform for the entrance and exit of passengers on the defendant's road.

The plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the train, on which she was a passenger, did not stop at the platform at Tuscarora but only slackened, and did stop about 300 feet from the platform; that the conductor used profane language but not to her, and got off the car and told the plaintiff in a rough manner to "get off;" and upon her asking him how, replied "jump;" and that thereupon she did jump with the youngest child in her arms; that the car step from which she jumped was about three feet from the top of the rail, and that the ground was fifteen inches below the rail; so that, according to her evidence, the distance she jumped was about four feet three inches. She also gave evidence tending to show the injuries she received from the jump.

The defendant gave evidence tending to show that the train did stop at Tuscarora, but not long enough for plaintiff to get off; but that the engineer, mistaking a salutation made by the conductor to a friend for a signal to start, started off before plaintiff could get off the train; that the train was stopped as soon as it could be, at the distance of about ninety feet from the platform; that Mrs. Leapley appeared upon the platform of the car with her children, and seemed very anxious to get off, and that she was assisted and lifted down with all possible care and gentleness, and that no profane language was used, or anything said to wrong her; that the distance from the lowest step of the car to the ground was not more than about two and one half feet, and that plaintiff made no objection to getting off where she did; this is the defendant's evidence.

That the carriers of passengers are required to observe the utmost care is a question now so well settled that it is not necessary to quote authorities. If the carrier is a corporation its agents are required to use the same care. They, the agents, are presumed and required to have the ordinary senses, especially in so responsible a position as the conductor of a railroad train.

They certainly are presumed and required to have the ordinary eyesight, so that they can distinguish between a man in the vigor of his life and a woman in a state of pregnancy and accompanied by young children. They are expected to have and must have, in order to discharge their duty properly, judgment enough to know that what would be safe for the one would not be safe for the other. Whether this care which the law requires was observed is the question in this case.

There is really no very important conflict of testimony. The woman bought a ticket from Washington to Tuscarora, a known station, with the ordinary platform for the passengers to get on and off the cars by. This ticket gave her the right to be put off on that platform; whether the cars slowed up but did not actually stop, or whether they did stop but not long enough for the plaintiff to get off, is immaterial; the result is precisely the same. By the act of the defendant, she could not get off at the place that her ticket contracted that she could get off. This failure of the Railroad Company to put the plaintiff off at the usual platform provided for that purpose, and when no good reason existed why it did not do so, we think was an act of negligence on the part of the Company; and if the plaintiff was injured thereby and without fault on her part, she is entitled to recover.

But, notwithstanding the improper conduct of the defendant, if the plaintiff, by her own negligence and want of care, contributed to the accident, she would not have been entitled to recover, and the defendant's third prayer should have been granted, had there been any evidence legally sufficient to support it; but we perceive none in the record. According to the defendant's evidence, the conductor took from her arms the young child, and the brakeman, a strong man, lifted the plaintiff down. There is certainly nothing in this defendant's proof showing the slightest want of care on the part of the plaintiff. If we take her evidence, we find that she was told by the conductor to "jump off," and that she did so. In so doing she was only obeying the explicit orders of the person in charge of the train, and to whom the safety of the passengers was committed. It would come with a very ill grace from the road to say to the passengers "You have been careless and negligent because you obeyed the order of my agent." Whether we take the evidence of plaintiff or defendant, we find no element of contributory negligence, and the third prayer was properly refused for that reason.

The defendant's second prayer is based upon the hypothesis that in obeying the order of the conductor she committed an act of negligence; and what we have already said disposes of that prayer.

The fourth prayer of defendant is based upon another erroneous hypothesis. That prayer asks the court to say substantially that although the defendant did wrong in not stopping at the platform, yet if the conductor and brakeman helped her down as carefully as they could, then she cannot recover, although she was injured in so getting down. In other words, that if after the defendant had been guilty of an inexcusable act of carelessness and negligence, it was guilty of no more negligence, then it should be excused. The statement of the proposition carries its refutation with it. The plaintiff offered two prayers which were granted. The first prayer is a full and correct statement of the law of the case and was properly granted.

We have heretofore said that the defendant was guilty of negligence in carrying the plaintiff beyond the platform; still, if the plaintiff, by her own negligence in getting off, contributed to the injury, she could not recover. It was to meet that view of the case that the second prayer of plaintiffs was offered, and we think properly granted by the court. If, without any direction from the conductor, the plaintiff had jumped from the cars as detailed by her, it might well have been said that she had not used that due care which she was bound to use. But if she was excited and alarmed by the language used by the conductor, although it was not addressed to her, and in that condition she was told by the conductor to jump, and she did so, we have already said that such an act did not constitute contributory negligence; and it was, therefore, proper for the court so to instruct the jury.

Seeing no error in the ruling, the judgment must be affirmed.

v.

Charles ROHR.

1. A discharge in insolvency, granted by the same court in which an issue of nul tiel record is on trial, may be proved by the docket entries and original papers. The production of a formal record is not necessary.
2. It is not essential to the validity of a discharge in insolvency by the circuit court that a formal order should be written out and signed by the judge at the time the discharge is ordered.

(Decided October, 1886.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, in favor of plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Miller, Irving and Bryan, JJ.

The questions presented for review are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard Grason and William Grason, for appellant:

The circuit courts, sitting in insolvency, are courts of law, exercising as such a jurisdiction conferred by statute, and a verbal direction given to the clerk to grant a final discharge, and the entry so made by the clerk (who is the mere hand of the court, by which all judgments at law are entered upon its dockets) of "petitioner finally discharged" is as effective and binding as a written order signed by the judge.

Johns v. Fritchey, 39 Md. 258; State v. Logan, 33 Md. 1-9.

If the appellee should be right in his contention that there was irregularity in granting the discharge of the petitioner, that there should have been an order in writing, granting the discharge, the appellant submits that the evidence as offered was admissible; it was the record of a court of general jurisdiction; the docket entry of "Petitioner finally discharged" in legal con-temptation, was made under the eye and with the sanction of the court, and should be considered and taken as a judicial act; and for that reason is no longer open to question or controversy in any collateral proceeding.

Tabler v. Castle, 22 Md. 94; Clark v. Bryan, 16 Md. 171; Hunter v. Hatton, 4 Gill, 115; Davis v. Helbig, 27 Md. 465; 2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. § 812; 18 Md. 438.

Mr. Wm. Pinkney Whyte, also for appellant:

The docket entries do not show whether the case was tried by a jury on the issue joined on the first and second pleas, or by the court without the aid of a jury; and if the latter was the case, the record should show that it was by consent, and it not so appearing, the judgment on its face is void.

Desche v. Gies, 56 Md. 185.

Messrs. John I. Yellott and D. G. McIntosh, for appellee:

The discharge of an insolvent is the act of the court, and not that of the clerk. The extent of the clerk's authority in insolvent proceedings is clearly defined by the Insolvent Law, and relates entirely to certain preliminary matters.

See Code of 1878, art. 67, §§ 4, 16.

The Act of 1880, chap. 172, rendered unnecessary the production of anything more than a certified copy of the discharge, to establish the plea of discharge in insolvency.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action of assumpsit was brought by the appellee against the appellant on the 8th of July, 1884, in the Circuit Court for Baltimore County. The defendant pleaded that on the 21st of June, 1879, he was by the same court adjudged an insolvent debtor, and discharged as such from all debts and contracts made before the filing of his application. To this plea there was a replication of nul tiel record, and upon the trial of this issue before the court the defendant offered in evidence the docket entries in the matter of his application for the benefit of the insolvent laws, entered on the insolvent docket of the court, together with the original papers in the insolvent proceeding; but the court refused to receive them in evidence and gave judgment for the plaintiff on the issue thus joined. The defendant excepted to the ruling excluding these docket entries and original papers as evidencing the discharge; and this is the only matter presented for review by this appeal.

The application in insolvency having been made in the same court in which the issue of nul tiel record was on trial, it was not necessary to produce a formal record of the insolvent proceedings. All that it was incumbent upon the defendant to do was to have the docket entries and original papers laid before the court for its inspection; and if these showed his final discharge, his plea should have been sustained. The docket entry in this respect is as follows: "June 21, 1879, certif. pub. notice filed, same day petitioner finally discharged;" and on the original petition there is this indorsement, signed by the clerk: "Petitioner discharged June 21, 1879. By order of court."

The presumption from the docket entry itself is that the court, while in session, ordered the discharge; and that the clerk made the entry thereof at the time in open court, in the presence and under the eye and direction of the judge, in the same manner as similar entries in other law cases are made. We understand that the learned judge of the court below made the ruling excepted to, upon the ground that there appeared to be no formal order of discharge written out and signed by the judge or judges sitting at the time the discharge was ordered. But this was by no means essential to its validity. The proceedings in insolvency are on the law side of the court, and there was no provision of the insolvent laws then in force requiring such formal orders to be signed by the judges. It is true a practice to that effect may have prevailed in some of the circuits, but it has not in others; and such a practice to have the force of law must have been at least universal and long continued.

But it is objected in argument that this docket entry does not show from what the court ordered the defendant to be discharged. But it is plain that it must be read in connection with the previous entries and all the original papers, and in view of their purpose and object as well as the provisions of the insolvent laws under which they were taken. So read the entry was short but appropriate, and expresses all that was necessary as the basis of a full record. It would have been the duty of the clerk, if he had been required to make out a formal record, to extend and amplify this entry to the effect that the court ordered the petitioner to be "fully and finally discharged from all debts and contracts made before the filing of the application aforesaid."

Again; it is further argued that the proof was properly rejected because the offer of the docket entries and original papers was coupled with an offer of a certificate of the clerk of the court, of the final discharge of the defendant; and it is said that this was never filed, was not produced as one of the original papers in the custody of the clerk, and was in fact an outside paper forming no part of the record. But conceding this to be the character of this paper, what harm was done to the appellee by simply laying such surplus matter before the court? Or what effect could it have had upon the judgment which the court was called upon to render on this issue? It was the plain duty of the court to inspect the docket entries and original papers and determine from them whether they contained a sufficient record of the defendant's discharge. If they showed a discharge he was entitled to the benefit of it, no matter what papers the clerk may have written outside of his duty and outside of those which constituted and formed part of the record.

In our judgment the docket entries and original papers in the insolvent case show a valid, final discharge of the defendant from the contract sued upon. The ruling complained of was therefore erroneous; and the judgment on the issue of nul tiel record should have been in favor of the defendant, and his plea of discharge sustained. The record shows that the plaintiff, in reply to the plea of discharge, also set up a new promise after the discharge; and in order that he may have the benefit of a trial of this issue the cause will be remanded.

Judgment reversed and new trial awarded.

SUPREME COURT.

W. K. BECK, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Mary A. CHURCH, Admr.

No execution can be issued on a judgment, transferred from one county to another after the lien of the original judgment had expired, under the Act of April 16, 1840, without revival.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, dismissing a rule to set aside an alias fi. fa. Reversed.

Reported below, in 1 Pa. C. C. R. 56.

The facts are stated in the following opinion of the court below, by ARCHBOLD, J.:

"Judgment was originally entered against the defendant in Luzerne County, July 31, 1875, and transferred to this county December, 18, 1884. There had been no revival in the old county, and without any revival here execution was forthwith issued. This rule was thereupon taken, on the ground that no execution could issue until a scire facias had gone out and judgment been obtained thereon.

"This exact point was ruled by Judge Hand in the case of Crago v. Dartie, No. 89, April Term, 1888, in this court, where he held that a judgment, transferred under the Act of 1840, acquires such a status as a judgment in the county to which it is transferred, that execution may issue thereon, without a preceding scire facias, even though the judgment in the original county be over five years old at the time of the transfer.

"I cannot agree with this interpretation of the law. But as it would work intolerable confusion to have the judges of this court ruling differently on a question of practice regulating the conduct of the prothonotary's office, I consider it my duty to be governed in the determination of this case by what has been decided in the case of Crago v. Dartie, simply expressing my dissent therefrom and the reasons for it.

"The Act of 1840 is to be construed in harmony with the Act of June 16, 1836, regulating executions, where it is provided that no execution shall be issued upon any judgment after the expiration of the period fixed (originally a year and a day, but subsequently enlarged to five years), unless the party defendant shall be first warned by scire facias, etc. By the Act of April 16, 1840, a judgment transferred to another county is to have the same force and effect, and no other, as if originally entered in the court to which it is thus transferred. The statute does not give full status to such judgment obtained by transfer.

"As said by Judge Gibson, in Brandt's App. 16 Pa. 346: 'It is not, then, a very judgment, but a quasi judgment; and that, too, only for limited purposes.' It is affected with all the weakness of the original, and must stand or fall with it. Nor can such judgment by transfer be itself transferred to another county; Melton v. Guthrie, 51 Pa. 116; and it is transferred in its character as a judgment, and not as a lien. Thus, until the recent Act of Assembly, an award of arbitrators could not be transferred until the judgment had become absolute by failure to appeal. Hallman's Appeal, 18 Pa. 810.

"Nor could a verdict docketed as a lien be transferred; Bailey v. Eder, 90 Pa. 446; nor a decree in equity for the payment of money. Brooke v. Phillips, 88 Pa. 188.

"Now, when a judgment has stood over five years, it will not support an execution until a scire facias has issued and been pressed to judgment. If, in such state, it is transferred to another county, it is to have the same force and effect, and no other, as if originally entered in such county. The condition in which it is, is continued in its transferred state; otherwise it would be given a new force and effect, and one which it did not before possess. In its unrevived condition it had in a certain sense ceased to bind the defendant's person. How could the mere transfer remove this condition, when by the very terms of the Act it is to have no other force and effect than if originally entered in the court to which it is transferred? Such transfer is said by C. J. Lowrie, in King v. Nimick, 84 Pa. 298, to have a strong analogy to a testatum execution. But it is clear that no testatum could run from an unrevived judgment into another county.

"This does not conflict with Knauss' Appeal, 49 Pa. 420. The question there was of lien merely, and not of execution. The judgment when transferred was in full life; and the court simply held that it acquired a lien by its transfer, distinct from and independent of the lien in the old country, so that the expiration there did not affect the judgment as transferred.

"But in that very case Judge Agnew says: 'The proceedings to enforce collection (of the transferred judgment) shall be according to the Act of 1836; and therefore if the debt is presumed to be paid so as to require a scire facias, it must be revived before proceeding to execution.'

"I should therefore hold, if the question were de novo in this court, that, while the Act of 1840 allows any judgment to be transferred to another county, it has no other force and effect than if originally entered in such county; and if, at the time of its transfer, it is over five years old, so that no execution could issue thereon, a scire facias must issue on the judgment so entered by transfer, and be proceeded in to judgment, before an execution can properly be taken thereon.

"But, for the reasons first given, I must discharge this rule."

The defendant took this writ, assigning for error the action of the court in discharging the rule, and in permitting execution of the judgment.

Messrs. Samuel W. Edgar and Lemuel Amerman, for plaintiff in error:

By the express terms of the Act, the transferred judgment is to have the same force and effect and no other of the original judgment, as to lien, revival, execution, etc.

Act of April 16, 1840.

The lapse of five years raises the presumption of payment of an unrevived judgment. The mere transfer to another county cannot remove that presumption.

The proper place to ask for relief is in the court whence the execution issues, as that is the source of the injustice.

The opinion of the court below is an unanswerable argument to sustain our position.

Mr. H. M. Hannah, for defendant in error:

The territorial extent of a judgment and the lien and the duration of the lien are fixed by statute. A necessary incident of a judgment is the right of execution. That the period of lien and right of execution are the same was a matter of accident, because the statute made them so.

Execution may exist without a lien, as in the case of after-acquired real estate. And a lien may exist in a county where no judgment exists at all, as in the case of a test. fi. fa. All this is accomplished by statute.

By the terms of the Act of 1840, the judgment entered on the transcript. "As to liens, revivals, executions, and so forth, it shall have the same force and effect, and no other, as if the judgment had been entered, or the transcript been originally filed in the same court to which it may be thus transferred."

The plaintiff in error asks that from the force and effect of such a judgment we deduct a certain incident which the judgment in Luzerne County had lost by lapse of time.

The new judgment does not derive its incidents from the old, unless imposed by statute. These incidents are not hereditary. The new judgment has lost nothing by lapse of time. No presumption of payment has arisen as to it. The only tenable theory in the plaintiff's case is that the old judgment in Luzerne County should have been revived before the removal. But this the statute does not require either by express condition or by implication.

The provision in the Act of 1840, that the proceedings to enforce collection shall be according to the Act of 1836, merely relates to the number and kind of executions which the plaintiff may have on his new judgment.

This provision was necessary to make it plain that the new judgment was intended to sustain an execution at all, and that it was not granted for the purpose of lien merely. By the Act of 1836, a test. fi. fa. was authorized in any county of the State. Unless expressly stated, it would have been a matter of grave doubt whether the Legislature intended by the Act of 1840 to authorize a second execution in the same county for the same debt.

The recital in the early part of the Act of 1840, specifying that the collection shall be "by execution, bill of discovery, or attachment, as prescribed," etc., clearly shows that the legislative mind was not then directed toward the part of the Act of 1836 relating to revivals of judgment before execution, but to the several forms of execution provided by that Act.

The question is fully discussed and decided in King v. Nimick, 34 Pa. 298, and Knauss' App. 49 Pa. 420

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

The errors assigned arise from the refusal of the court to set aside an execution issued in the County of Lackawanna on a judgment transferred from the County of Luzerne. It was recovered there in July, 1875, and transferred in 180

December, 1884. As the judgment had not been revived in the county in which it was recovered, and under the statute no execution could issue on it there, did a transfer thereof to another county, nine years after its rendition, authorize an execution thereon to issue forthwith?

The construction of the Act of 1840, authorizing the transfer of judgments to another county, is not entirely free from difficulty. The tendency of the decisions has been to restrict the effect of the judgments thereby created. Hence it was held in Brandt's App. 16 Pa. 343, that the record transferred under the Act does not become a very judgment of the court of the county in which it is entered, but a quasi judgment, and that too only for limited purposes; that the regularity or merits of it cannot be reviewed elsewhere than in the county where it was recovered, further than to stay execution. If the original judgment be set aside, the judgment entered on the transcript falls with it. The latter is not an independent and self-sustaining judgment. Two independent judgments of the very same kind, each binding the person and each for the same thing, cannot be sustained. If it were otherwise, the payment of one would not be a satisfaction or discharge of the other.

Although the Act of March 29, 1859, declares that decrees in equity for the payment of the money shall be and constitute a lien on the real estate of the defendant named in the decree, for the like period and with the same force and effect as the lien of a judgment rendered by and in a common-law court of this Commonwealth and be entered in a like manner in the judgment or lien docket of the proper county; yet it was held in Brooke v. Phillips, 83 Pa. 183, that such a decree cannot be transferred to another county for the purpose of lien and execution, as in case of a judgment at law.

To hold that an execution may be issued by the court of the county in which the transcript of the record is filed, without a revival there, when none can be issued in the county where the parent judgment remains, would be to sanction a proceeding not within the meaning of the statute, but one in conflict with the spirit of the decisions giving construction thereto.

The learned judge was correct in the reasons which he gave in favor of setting aside the execution, but was wrong in adopting the conclusion of the president judge in another case.

Judgment reversed; and rule, to show cause why the alias fi. fa. should not be set aside, made absolute.

v.
UNION NATIONAL BANK of Pittsburgh.

1. Where a cashier's check is given by a debtor to a creditor for a pre-existing debt, the presumption of law is that it was intended only as a conditional payment.
2. A surrender, by the creditor, of the note of the debtor, upon receipt of the check, will not overcome this presumption.

3. Facts cannot be inferred in a case stated; and what is not stated must be presumed not to exist.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

In error to Common Pleas No. 1, Allegheny County, to review a judgment for plaintiff. Affirmed.

Amicable action of trespass on the case, and case stated, in which the following facts were agreed upon:

On May 24, 1884, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,287.67, for which the plaintiff held the promissory note of the defendant, which that day matured and became payable. On the same day the defendant had on deposit to its credit, with the Penn Bank, a corporation carrying on the business of banking in the City of Pittsburgh, the sum of $3,115.02, subject to check, no part of which has been paid defendant except as herein stated: the defendant drew its check on the Penn Bank aforesaid for $2,287.67, and presented the same to the said Penn Bank, which received the same and charged the same to the defendant's account, and issued and delivered to the defendant an instrument in writing, in the form, words and figures following, to wit:

No. 24,438. Pittsburgh, May 24, 1884.

PENN BANK.

Pay to the order of R. S. Smith, Esq., Ca.

Twenty-two hundred thirty-seven " Dollars. $2,287.67 E. G. Normecutt, the said R. S. Smith being the cashier of the plaintiff Bank.

Teller.

The defendant received the instrument last mentioned, and, on the same day, presented the same, without indorsement, to the plaintiff, which received the same and delivered to the defendant its promissory note aforesaid.

On May 26, 1884, the 25th being Sunday, the plaintiff caused the said instrument, issued as aforesaid by the said Penn Bank, to be duly presented, duly indorsed to the said Penn Bank, at its banking house, for payment thereof, and payment thereof to be there duly demanded of said Penn Bank, which was then and there refused by the said Penn Bank, which had suspended and has not since resumed payment of its obligations, being insolvent; whereupon the same instrument was the same day duly protested for nonpayment thereof, and the plaintiff the same day duly notified the defendant of said presentment, demand and refusal; demanded payment by the defendant of the said sum of $2,287.67, and offered to return to the defendant, duly indorsed, but without recourse, the said instrument so protested as aforesaid; which the plaintiff is and has always been ready and willing to return to the defendant, duly indorsed, but without recourse, upon payment of the said sum of $2,287.67, with the interest thereon, or the return of the said promissory note, by the defendant to the plaintiff.

On May 28, 1884, the said Penn Bank assigned all its property to Henry Warner, Esq., in trust for its creditors; at which time, without charging against it the amount of the said instrument so protested as aforesaid, there was to its credit with the plaintiff the sum of $965.85, being a balance of the proceeds of sundry notes, of which none were payable when the said assignment for creditors was made; and some are now, and others not yet payable, which were made for the accommodation of the said Penn Bank and indorsed by it, and were discounted for it by the plaintiff, on May 23, 1884, in reliance upon its solvency, although it was then insolvent, and are now held by the plaintiff; for the recovery of which sum of $965.85 an action has been brought by the said Warner, assignee as aforesaid, against the plaintiff, in said court, and is yet pending.

If on the foregoing case the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the judgment to be for the plaintiff and against the defendant, for $2,287.67, or for the same less $965.85, as shall be adjudged right, with interest from May 24, 1884, $1.50 costs of protest, and costs of suit; otherwise judgment to be for the defendant for its costs.

The court entered judgment, in the following opinion by Stowe, P. J.:

"I do not think, under the facts set out in the foregoing case stated, that the receipt of the cashier's check of the Penn Bank and the contemporaneous delivery to defendant (of the note in question) amounted to anything more than conditional payment. But as the plaintiff had some $965.85 belonging to the Penn Bank in its possession and to its credit, upon its books as due it by plaintiff, and which it could pro tanto have set off the amount of this cashier's check against at the time of demand and refusal of payment; and as the assignee can stand in no better position than his assignor in this regard, I think equity would give defendant a right to require plaintiff to hold such sum for its use and benefit; and therefore to that extent I am of opinion defendant is entitled to a set-off against plaintiff's claim.

"Judgment is now directed to be entered, on the foregoing case stated, in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, for $2,287.67, less $965.85, the amount to the credit of the Penn Bank as above stated, viz.: $1,271.82, with interest from May 24, 1884, and costs of suit."

The plaintiff and defendant both excepted. The plaintiff assigned for error the action of the court: 1, in not holding that the check was satisfaction and discharge of the note; 2, in not entering judgment for the defendant; and 3, in entering judgment for the plaintiff as above.

For decision on defendant's exception, see next case (post, 262).

Mr. George W. Guthrie, for plaintiff in error:

A debt may be satisfied and discharged either by novation or by accord and satisfaction. While neither of these constitutes a technical payment, either operates as fully to satisfy and discharge the debt as though it had been actually paid.

The general rule (that where a negotiable instrument, whether of the debtor himself or of a third person, is received in consideration of a pre-existing indebtedness, the prima facie presumption is that it is received simply as conditional payment) is subject to at least one well established exception: in Bayard v. Shunk, 1 Watts & S. 92, this court held that the acceptance by the creditor from the debtor, of bank notes, would be presumed to be a discharge and satisfaction of the debt, even though the bank had failed at the time.

A cashier's check has all the characteristics of "currency," and resembles an ordinary bank note in every particular. It is issued by a regularly organized banking company; being commercial paper, it will pass from hand to hand, free from any equities affecting prior parties (Penn Bank v. Frankish, 91 Pa. 339); it does not bear interest, and therefore, like "cash," is only valuable as a medium of exchange; it is payable on demand, without grace; it circulates on the credit of the bank issuing it.

The instruments being alike in all their characteristics, the necessity for uniformity in commercial law requires that they should be given the same technical operation in all business transactions.

They were adopted, as bank notes were adopted, to facilitate business transactions. It would be utterly impossible to carry on financial and commercial operations in the large business centers without them; both because there is not sufficient actual cash with which to pay debts, and because if there were, the delay in counting such cash would render it impossible to get through the daily business.

The language of Chief Justice Gibson, in the case of Bayard v. Shunk, supra, applies to such instruments without the change of a word: "They are lent by the banks as cash; they are paid away as cash; and the language of Lord Mansfield in Miller v. Rice, 1 Burr. 452, was not too strong when he said: 'They are not goods, nor securities, nor documents for debts; but are treated as money, as cash, in the ordinary course and transaction of business by the general consent of mankind, which gives them the credit and currency of money to all intents and purposes; they are as much money as guineas themselves are, or any other coin that is used in common payments as money or cash.' If such were their legal character in England, where there was but one bank, how emphatically must it be so here where they have supplanted coin for every purpose but that of small change, and where they have excluded it from circulation almost entirely."

Where the holder of a note surrenders it at maturity to the maker, and accepts from him the note of a third person, payable to his (the holder's) own order, the original note is satisfied and the maker's liability thereon is at an end. This rule is applied to instruments under seal.

Shen. Touch. p. 70; Cross v. Powell, 9 Cro. Eliz. 433; Lacey v. Lacey, 7 Pa. 251.

Certainly it should be applied to the case of the surrender at maturity of a negotiable instrument which passes from hand to hand by mere delivery.

A note for a less sum than the amount of the debt will discharge the debt.

Goddard v. O'Brien, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 87 and cases cited.

Where in a case stated the evidence of the facts is set forth rather than the facts themselves, the court will treat it as a demurrer to the evidence, and draw every inference which a jury might draw.

Anent v. Sarver, 2 Grant, Cas. 34; Parker v. Urie, 21 Pa. 305.

In 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 271, the rule is said to be that when the securities held by the creditor are surrendered at the time the new instrument is delivered and accepted, the inference will be strong, if not irresistible, that the debt is satisfied.

In Estate of Davis v. Desruque, 5 Whart. 538, it appeared that on the maturity of a joint obligation, one of the debtors gave to the creditor his own individual obligation for the amount, and the original joint obligation was delivered to him. In delivering the opinion of the court, Rogers, J., says:

"Whether taking the separate note of one of the partners amounts to an extinguishment or satisfaction of a joint debt depends upon the intention of the parties; and in the absence of all proof of a special contract, the giving up or the retention of the original security will in general be a decisive circumstance; for it is difficult to account for the fact, except on the supposition that in the one case it was intended, in case of need, to enforce the joint liability; or, in the other, to depend altogether upon the responsibility of one of the joint debtors. Where a joint debtor insists that the separate note is substituted and is in satisfaction of a joint debt, the onus is thrown upon him; and to discharge himself from liability it will be necessary to show a special contract to that effect; or that, in addition to a separate note being taken for the amount of debt, the original bills were given up."

This language was cited and relied upon in Morris v. Hurvey, 75 Va. 732. See also Arnold v. Camp, 12 Johns. 409; Dennis v. Williams, 40 Ala. 638; Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. C. C. 273.

Plaintiff accepted the cashier's check payable to its own order and, without requiring any guaranty, surrendered the note to the maker. The inference is irresistible that it accepted the new obligation in satisfaction and discharge of the old one.

In Chitty on Contracts, p. 826, the author says: "It was decided in Eyles v. Ellis, 4 Bing. 112, that an actual transfer of the amount of a debt in a banker's book from the account of the debtor to that of the creditor with the consent of both is equivalent to payment." See also 2 Pars. Cont. p. 137, where the same rule is laid down. This is exactly what was done in the present case.

Mr. John G. Bryant, for defendant in error:

A payment of a pre-existing debt by the check, draft or note of a third person is presumed in law to be conditional only, and to overcome the presumption an agreement must be shown.

McIntyre v. Kennedy, 29 Pa. 448; League v. Waring, 85 Pa. 244; Waring v. Wunderlich, 25 Pitts. Legal Jour. 73; Miller v. Lutz, 32 Pitts. Legal Jour. 139.

In the case of a payment by check, the presumption is even stronger than in the case of payment by note or bill.

Olcott v. Rathbone, 5 Wend. 490; Heartt v. Rhodes, 66 Ill. 351.

And in case of payment by check, an agreement that the payment should be unconditional cannot be presumed as matter of law or inferred as matter of fact, from the fact of the surrender of an old note or bill on receipt of the check.

Russell v. Hankey, 6 Term R. 12; Ridley v. Blackett, Peake, Add. Cas. 62; Olcott v. Rathbone, 5 Wend. 490; Johnson v. Bank of North America, 5 Robt. 554; Smith v. Miller, 6 Robt. 157; Turner v. Bank of Fox Lake, 3 Keyes, 425; Burkhaller v. Second Nat. Bk. of Erie, 42 N. Y. 538.

"The delivery or surrender to the maker of the old note, upon its being renewed, does not in itself raise a presumption of its extinguishment by the new; it being considered as a conditional surrender, and that its obligation is restored and revived if the new note be not duly paid."

2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1266 a. See also Bank v. Good, 21 W. Va. 455; Heartt v. Rhodes, 66 Ill. 351; Hunter v. Moul, 2 Out. 13.

Respecting the cases seeming to hold the contrary it may be observed: In the Estate of Davis v. Desauque, 5 Whart. 538, and Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. C. C. Rep. 273, no notes had been given up, and the opinions were in that respect mere dicta; Manuel v. Miss. R. R. Co. 2 Pa. 198, was on a certificate of deposit taken up by the bank and paid in its bank bills, which were again deposited on receipt of a new certificate; and the court said: "The case does not resemble those that have been cited, where a note or security has been taken for a subsisting debt * * *." The true mode of viewing it * * * is that of an instrument of a special character, binding the bank to the payment of certain money, which money * * * has been paid him, and again deposited under a new engagement."

Macungie Bank v. Hottenstein, 89 Pa. 328, was a case of payment by an accommodation indorser, who received the old note, and thereby acquired the legal title thereto, and is not like the case of payment by the principal debtor by delivery of a new note. In Morris v. Harcey, 75 Va. 726, the note had been received expressly in "satisfaction of a judgment" on the notes given up. Arnold v. Camp, 12 Johns. 409, is now of no authority, in view of the later cases in the same State cited above, unless there be a distinction between the cases of payment by note and by check; and Dennis v. Williams, 40 Ala. 683, was ruled when the question of the presumption, where the old note was not given up, was still open in that State, and is therefore now of no authority.

In the case of Eyles v. Ellis, 4 Bing. 112, cited in the quotation under the fourth head of the argument for the plaintiff in error, the bank was the agent of the creditor for collection. The proposition there quoted, if correct, is not applicable to the present case, for in it there was no transfer of account, or consent thereto. But there is no difference between a transfer on a banker's book and a transfer on any other person's, for the relation of banker and customer is merely that of debtor and creditor.

Bank of Republic v. Millard, 10 Wall. 152 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 897).

That the check in question was payable to the plaintiff below, or its cashier, makes no difference, as is shown by the cases of League v. Waring, Waring v. Wunderlich, and Müller v. Lotz, cited above.

The cases respecting payment by bank bills have no application to the present. A bank bill or note is one issued to pass current as money, for an indefinite period, in the daily transactions of the people, and must be negotiable by mere delivery.

Morse, Banks, etc. chap. VIII, pp. 458-9.

Cashier's checks are not intended to circulate as money for an indefinite period, or for any period; but are merely instruments for making payment in money. They do not purport to be obligations or promises of the bank to pay money, and they only bind it by way of estoppel.

If one go to his banker and draw on and present to him a check, at the same time directing the amount thereof to be paid to his creditor, and the creditor, on hearing an order by the banker's teller for payment accordingly, in expectation of such payment, surrender a note to his debtor, could it be pretended, the banker then refusing to pay, that the note had been paid? This is the present case.

Assuming that an inference of an agreement to accept in absolute payment might be drawn from the fact of the surrender of the note, it cannot be drawn by the court. A presumption of one fact from others is an inference of fact, and cannot be drawn by the court.

Diehl v. Ihrie, 3 Wharton, 143.

A case stated is like a special verdict, and subject to the same rules.

Diehl v. Ihrie, supra; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Waterman, 54 Pa. 387; Kinsley v. Coyle, 58 Pa. 461.

The court is confined to the facts found by a special verdict, and cannot supply the want thereof by any argument or implication from what is expressly found.

Thayer v. Society of United Brethren, 20 Pa. 60; Loew v. Stocker, 61 Pa. 347.

Kinsley v. Coyle, supra; Holmes v. Wallace, 46 Pa. 266.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

We concur in opinion with the learned judge, that the receipt by the defendant in error, of the cashier's check on the Penn Bank, and the contemporaneous delivery of the note to the maker thereof, was a conditional payment, only, of the note.

The check was taken for a pre-existing debt. The case stated does not aver any agreement that it was to be accepted as an absolute payment. The burden of proof was on the maker of the note to overthrow the presumption that the check was taken as a conditional payment. It was of no higher character than the note, and it certainly was not money. Brown v. Scott, 51 Pa. 357; League v. Waring, 85 Pa. 244; Miller v. Lotz, 15 Pittsb. Legal Jour. 139.

A case stated is in the nature of a special verdict. Facts must be stated and not left to inference. What is not stated must be presumed not to exist. Berka Co. v. Pile, 18 Pa. 493.

Due diligence was used in presenting the check on the next business day after it was received, and payment thereof was demanded and refused. Thereupon, on the same day, the check was duly protested for nonpayment, and the plaintiff in error was duly notified of the presentment, demand and refusal. Payment of the note was demanded, accompanied with an offer on its payment, to return the check.

The check not having been taken as a payment, and nothing having been realized thereon, the plaintiff in error has no just cause to complain of this judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

UNION NATIONAL BANK of Pittsburgh,
Plff. in Err.,
v.

CANNONSBURGH IRON COMPANY, Limited.

1. A set-off, to be allowed, must be a debt due between the same parties and in the same right, and complete when the action was instituted.
2. A bank received a cashier's check of another bank, as a conditional payment of the debt of a third party. The latter bank made an assignment in trust for creditors and the check was not paid on presentation. At the time of the assignment, there was, on the books of the first bank, a credit to the insolvent bank of the proceeds of notes, indorsed and discounted for the latter's accommodation. In an action by the first bank against the debtor, for the debt, held, that this deposit was not a valid set-off against the debt.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 1, of Allegheny County, to review a judgment for plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts appear by the preceding case. The assignments of error appear by the opinion of the court set forth in that case.

Mr. John G. Bryant, for plaintiff in error:

Set-off is inadmissible, unless it be between the same parties.

Carman v. Garrison, 18 Pa. 158; Milliken v. Gardner, 37 Pa. 450; Scott v. Fritz, 51 Pa. 418; 2 Smith, L. Cas. *320.

In case of the insolvency of the borrower before actual payment of the money by the lender, an equitable right, analogous to that of stoppage in transitu, may be exercised by the lender.

Dougherty v. Central Nat. Bank, 93 Pa. 227.

This doctrine is also recognized in Kensington Nat. Bank v. Shoemaker, 11 W. N. C. 215; the set-off in that case being disallowed only because it did not appear that the proceeds of the notes entered into the balance.

The balance in question would not have been the subject of either action or set-off by the Penn Bank or its assignee, because the plaintiff had a right or equity, arising out of the same transaction, to retain it.

But even if there was no such equity, the plaintiff had a right to set off the notes against the balance of their proceeds, even as against the assignee of the Penn Bank, which was absolutely liable on them, as they were made for its accommodation. In a case of voluntary assignment the right of set off exists, though one of the debts was not payable when it was made.

Jordan v. Sharlock, 84 Pa. 366.

Assuming that the plaintiff had an equal right to set off the check against the balance in question, it is not bound to elect to do so; especially as the defendant has not shown any equity superior to that of the plaintiff and of the makers of the notes.

Mr. Geo. W. Guthrie, for defendant in error:

The mere statement of facts shows how essentially different this case is from the case of Dougherty v. Central Nat. Bank, 93 Pa. 227, cited by the plaintiff in error.

In that case the bank, learning of the failure of Dougherty Bros. & Co. the day after their note was discounted, immediately, and before any assignment had been made or any portion of the proceeds of the discount had been paid out, rescinded its action, charged back to Dougherty Bros. & Co.'s account their old note, in renewal of which the one discounted was given, and tendered to Dougherty Bros. & Co. the new note, together with the collaterals deposited with it, and the amount of discount paid in cash. Not one of these circumstances exists in this case.

In delivering the opinion of this court, in that case, Trunkay, J., says: "The party whose debt is not due has no equitable claim to have it set off against a debt of his own already due, in the hands of a party who is insolvent." P. 231.

And again: "A bank has no lien on money standing to the credit of one of its depositors, for the amount of the note of such depositor, discounted by the bank, but which has not matured." P. 232.

This is the general rule, and is fully sustained by the cases cited, and applies exactly to this case.

Jordan v. Sharlock, 84 Pa. 366, is not in conflict with it. The action in that case was by the voluntary assignee of the holder of the note; the set-off claimed was due and payable at the time of the assignment, and was of course allowed.

In the case of Sitgreaves v. Bank, 49 Pa. 364, a case of the same character, this court said: "To shut out his defense, and make him pay the debt again, with a chance to recover it in an action against his principal, also in turn to recover it from the creditor, would be a circuity that neither law nor common sense would tolerate."

In Hutchinson v. Woodwell, 15 Pittsb. Legal Jour. 235, Mercur, C. J., in delivering the opinion of this court, said: "It is settled law, when the creditor has the means of satisfaction, either actually or potentially in his hands, or within his control as security, and does not choose to retain it, but relinquishes it, the surety is discharged."

Reed v. Garber, 12 Serg. & R. 100; Everly v. Rice, 20 Pa. 297; Boaschert v. Brown, 2 Pa. 372.

The same rule was again enunciated and applied by this court in the case of the Commercial Nat. Bank v. Henniger, 41 Legal Int. 356, where all the cases are fully discussed and explained by Paxson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court.

Carman v. Garrison, 13 Pa. 158, was decided on entirely different facts; the maker of the note having placed it in the hands of a broker for sale, on being sued by the purchaser, attempted to set off an alleged indebtedness of the purchaser to the broker, arising out of transactions having no connection with the sale of the note, and it was held that the set-off could not be allowed.

The plaintiff in error was under the obligation to exercise for the benefit of the defendant in error the diligence which any ordinarily prudent man would use in his own behalf. If the plaintiff in error were the absolute holder of this check, or if the defendant in error were insolvent, no one can hesitate to say what the action of the plaintiff in error would be; it would instantly charge this check to the account of the Penn Bank, and it should be required to take the same action, even though it holds it simply as conditional payment or for collection.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

This judgment was entered on a case stated. In an opinion just filed on a writ of error taken by the defendant, we held it had no cause to complain of the judgment. The complaint now to be considered is whether the judgment was not entered in favor of the plaintiff, for a less sum than it is entitled to under the admitted facts.

Conceding that the check given to plaintiff in error, on the Penn Bank, did not operate as a payment of the note held by the plaintiff against the defendant, yet the latter contends that it is entitled to a set-off for the sum of $965.85 which, on the 28th day of May, 1884, stood to the credit of the Penn Bank on the books of the plaintiff. It was a part of the proceeds of sundry notes discounted by the plaintiff on the 28d of May, for the accommodation of the Penn Bank. The latter bank in fact was then insolvent, but its insolvency was not then known to the plaintiff. On the 28th of May, the Penn Bank assigned all its property to Warner in trust for its creditors. The trustee has brought suit against the plaintiff to recover the $965.85; and that suit is still pending.

The court below thought the plaintiff was bound to set off or apply this sum on the note it held against the defendant, and entered judgment for the residue of the note only. This is assigned for error.

It is difficult to see on what principle the application of this sum can thus be enforced. The general rule is that a set-off is not allowable unless the debts be due between the same parties and in the same right. Potter v. Burd, PA.

4 Watts, 15; Milliken v. Gardner, 37 Pa. 456; Scott v. Fritz, 51 Pa. 418.

The money on deposit with the plaintiff was not due to the defendant. A set-off is in substance a cross action; and a cross demand must be complete when the action was instituted. Gunnis v. Cluff, 111 Pa. 512 [S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 356].

The defendant was in no condition to bring suit against the plaintiff for this money. It had no such right of action. It had no legal or equitable claim which it could thus enforce. That money was wholly res inter alios acta. The defendant was not a party to the transaction which produced the fund. It could not check it out. Prior to the assignment it had no right to be heard as to what disposition should be made of it. What right it has, if any, to share therein under the assignment is a question not now before us. Whether under the authority of Dougherty v. Cent. Nat. Bank, 93 Pa. 227, the plaintiff can show such equities as to retain the money on the notes it discounted for an insolvent may arise in the suit brought by the assignee.

Whatever the equities may be between the plaintiff and the Penn Bank, arising out of that transaction, it is clear the defendant cannot control the application of that fund. The plaintiff did not hold that money as security for the payment of a check drawn on another bank. When the check was dishonored he offered to return it to the defendant from whom he received it. We think the learned judge erred in holding that the defendant was entitled to set off the amount which stood in the Bank of the plaintiff to the credit of the Penn Bank.

Judgment reversed; and now, October 4, 1886, judgment in favor of the plaintiff, for $2,237.67 with interest from May 24, 1884, and $1.50 costs of protest, and costs of suit, according to agreement in case stated.

PITTSBURG JUNCTION R. R. Co's. Appeal.

1. The lands or right of way occupied by one railroad company for its corporate purposes cannot be taken as right of way by another railroad company, except for mere crossings; and then only for crossing purposes and not for exclusive occupancy.
2. This includes the grounds occupied by all the appliances necessary for the successful operation of the road, both in the present and in the future.
3. Where the evidence is conflicting as to the necessity of land for the uses of a railroad, the courts will make allowance for the future needs of the road.
4. While the franchises of a corporation are property and may be taken under the power of eminent domain, yet property taken by one corporation for a public use can not be taken by another corporation without an express grant or by necessary implication.
5. There can be no implication, unless it arises from an absolute necessity, such that without it the grant itself would be defeated.

6. A railroad company will be restrained from locating its road across the premises of another railroad company, used as yards for repairing, storing and shifting cars, etc., and large enough for the future needs of the road; the proposed line causing inconvenience and alterations in these premises and there being another route by which the proposed line can be built, although at greater cost.
7. The Act of June 19, 1871, regulating the crossing of lines of railroad by other railroads, does not apply to the crossing of yard tracks and switches which are merely incident to the use of the main line.
8. In injunction proceedings to restrain one railroad from locating a designated branch line across the yards of another, the master suggested a decree designating another route across the same lands and that the injunction be dissolved. The court sustained exceptions to the master's report and perpetually enjoined the defendant from taking any of the lands of the plaintiff. Affirmed on appeal.

(Trunkley and Clark, JJ., dissenting.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPEAL from a decree of Common Pleas No. 1, of Allegheny County, in equity, sustaining exceptions to the report of a master and enjoining the defendant, the Pittsburg Junction Railroad Company, from taking the land of the plaintiff, the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company, for railroad purposes. Affirmed.

The Pittsburg Junction Railroad Company, the appellant, desiring to construct a branch road from its main line in the City of Pittsburg, along the Allegheny River, to connect with other railroads and to gain access to mills and furnaces on the river, surveyed and located a route through the property of the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company. This property was used as a freight yard and extended from Forty-Third Street to Forty-Seventh Street, and from an unopened street on the south, to low water line on the river front.

This yard contained an engine house of eighteen stalls, a machine shop, water tanks, coal chute, ice house, storeroom for engine stores, blacksmith shop and tool house and other buildings, and a number of tracks for the storage of cars and for making up trains; and also a repair yard, for the repair of cars, and a coach yard for the storage of passenger coaches when not in use.

The Pittsburg Junction Railroad Company not being able to agree with the other company, presented its bond to the court below. The Allegheny Valley Railroad Company filed exceptions. Pending these exceptions, the Pittsburg Junction Railroad Company, claiming that the ground over which its branch line was located, between Forty-Third and Forty-Fourth Streets, had been dedicated to public use by a former owner, commenced to lay its tracks thereon, crossing a switch track belonging to the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company.

The latter company thereupon filed this bill in equity, praying for an injunction to restrain the former Company, from entering upon any of the property of the plaintiff, or interfering, etc.; and with a prayer for general relief. The court granted a preliminary injunction, restraining the defendant from entering upon or interfering with the property of the plaintiff between Forty-Third and Forty-Seventh Streets, and the street bounding the property on the south side; and any other property of plaintiff between Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Streets and on the south side of low water mark of the Allegheny River.

The defendant, after answering the bill, prayed for a decree that it had authority to take the property for the construction of its highway.

Samuel C. Schoyer was appointed master and examiner to take testimony. The master found that the proposed line, as originally located, cuts through the coach yard, repair yard and about twenty-four feet of the coal chute.

During the progress of the hearing, the defendant proposed a new location, nearer the river, lessening the injury to the plaintiff. This was done, however, without any action on the part of the board of directors. The master held that this change of location could be made by the court under the Act of June 19, 1871, regulating the "crossing of lines of railroads by other railroads."

The evidence as to whether defendant's proposed line would seriously interfere with the use of plaintiff's yard at present or in the future was conflicting. It was conceded that either route would require a rearrangement of yards, tracks and buildings.

As to the practicability of another route not across plaintiff's property, a witness for plaintiff said defendant could continue its line by an elevated railroad from Thirty-Third Street to the river at Forty-Seventh Street, but at greater cost.

A witness for defendant testified that such a route was "unreasonably practicable," as the line would cost $400,000 without right of way.

The master held that "The defendant Company, under the right of eminent domain, may legally take and appropriate said land of the plaintiff Company, not necessary for its franchises, or the operation of its road." Exception. Sustained. Assignment of error.

Also that "There is no other reasonably practicable route on the said line on which defendant Company's road could be built to the terminal point, Negley's Run." Exception. Sustained. Assignment of error.

Also "That the coal chute erected by the plaintiff, as finished in 1883, is greatly in excess of the present or any probable future necessity (of plaintiff), and might be reduced on the river front one third." Exception. Sustained. Assignment of error.

Also that "The defendant Company's line could be built on the proposed new location without any interference to the plaintiff in its franchises or in the practical working or operation of its railroad; and said location will require the removal of but nine feet of its coal chute and a slight change of the position of the tracks of the plaintiff's coach and repair yards, by moving them closer to the engine house, which would not lessen their capacity." Exception. Sustained. Assignment of error.

Also that "The trackage and siding facilities of plaintiff Company, already constructed, are ample for their present business; and those proposed to be constructed would be ample for their necessity for years to come." Exception. Sustained. Assignment of error.

The master recommended a decree that the defendant had lawful right to take a right of way twenty-four feet in width, across the property of the plaintiff between Forty-Third and Forty-Seventh Streets, for its branch railroad; and that it should be located upon the changed route. He further recommended that, upon the defendant filing a bond, the preliminary injunction should be dissolved.

The plaintiff filed, inter alia, the exceptions above mentioned. The court sustained the exceptions and made the injunction perpetual. The defendant thereupon appealed, assigning for error, inter alia, the action of the court in making the injunction perpetual, in sustaining the exceptions, and in not confirming the master's report and entering a decree as therein recommended.

Messrs. John McCleave and Geo. Shiras, Jr., for appellant:

The right of eminent domain is given over all lands, with the exceptions expressed of burial grounds, etc. It includes lands already dedicated to public use, expressly naming roads, streets and alleys.

Act of February 19, 1849, §§ 10, 18; Cleveland & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. v. Speer, 56 Pa. 332.

This right will be restrained when it is sought to apply it to lands already devoted to public use, in such manner as utterly to destroy or in a great degree defeat the prior public use.

The right to cross the track necessarily involves the right to cross all lands necessary for the approach to such track. No restriction of this right can be based upon the dimensions of the land of the old company, or upon the use to which the tracks to be crossed may chance to be devoted. The right to cross also necessarily involves, to some extent at least, the right of exclusive occupancy, as for the support of embankments, or abutments, etc. Such crossing necessarily involves an appropriation of the land, for the tracks must be laid upon the land.

There are decisions construing and giving effect to similar statutes conferring the power to cross.

The general grant of power to take lands does not include the power to take a street.

Cake v. Philadelphia & Erie R. R. Co. 87 Pa. 811.

To imply the power by necessary implication the necessity, on the appellant's part, to invade the appellee's property for the purposes of its switch, must be: 1, so absolute that the appellant's grant of power must fail if the invasion be prevented; and 2, the necessity must arise, from the very nature of things, without being created by the appellant itself, for its own convenience or for the sake of economy.

Pa. R. R. Co's. App. 93 Pa. 151.

The fact that every mill, furnace and manufactory sought to be reached directly by appellant Company can be reached by a short haul over the appellee's tracks, right to which is secured by the Constitution, would seem to be a conclusive answer to this plea of necessity.

Art. XVII., § 1, Const. 1874.

It is useless to attempt to discriminate, in the application of the rule, between land and a franchise. In this case the land is of no use without the franchise, nor is the franchise of any use without the land. The use of the land and the land to be used together constitute the franchise.

Cleveland & P. R. R. Co. v. Speer, and Pa. R. R. Co's App. supra.

The appellant's claim of corporate rights and privileges is to be construed most strongly against it; and whatever does not appear to have been unequivocally granted to it must be taken to have been withheld.

"This rule is to be held in all its rigor where the attempt is so to construe a corporate grant as to interfere with a previous grant of the same kind."

Packer v. Sunbury & E. R. R. Co. 19 Pa. 211; P. R. R. Co's App. supra.

The cases cited in the argument for the appellant will, upon examination, be found to be generally either contests as to the occupation of streets, as to crossings, or as to the occupation of land held by corporations not railroads, but of a private character. No one of them is authority for the proposition that exclusive occupancy by one railroad company of another railroad company's property laterally will be permitted, when such occupancy takes land actually in use and needed by the latter company.

When the bond was given the appellant acquired a prima facie right to enter on the located line described in the bond, but nowhere else.

Upon the bond being given, in due course of law, the grasp of the owner upon his property is loosened and the easement acquired passes, and he can only obtain payment on the bond.

The issue made up was as to the appellant's right to construct a branch railroad through the appellant's property, upon a route adopted by its board of directors, marked on the ground and in law already appropriated, if capable of appropriation. To that point the evidence was bound to be confined.

2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 850, 1; Story, Eq. Pl. § 257 et seq.

As a defendant cannot pray anything in his answer except to be dismissed the court, if he has any relief to pray, or discovery to seek, he must do so by a bill of his own, which is called a cross bill.

2 Barb. Ch. Pr. 126 (480); 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1649, note 3, and 1650; Story, Eq. Pl. § 391 et seq.

In the making of the original location the appellant's power was exhausted. This is apparent from the authorities already cited as to the effect of the filing of the bond.

A paper location, even if approved by the board, would have been no location in law.

New Brighton & N. C. R. R. Co's App. 105 Pa. 13.

Even under a new location, the appellant could acquire no rights, without a previous attempt and failure to agree with the land owner, and the tender and filing of a bond.

The second location is not claimed to be available without an entire rearrangement of the appellee's yard. A court of equity has no power to construct for it a new yard. An attempt upon the part of a court to exercise such functions was condemned by this court in the most unqualified terms in the case of New York & E. R. R. Co. v. Young, 83 Pa. 182.

The cases which decide that the company's delegated discretion as to such matters is controlling and conclusive are too numerous for citation. They will be found collected in 1 Wood, Railway Law, 645.

Crossings authorized by law refer to cases where both parties remain in the occupancy and use of their respective lines of railroad. And this is true whether the authority is to be derived from the Act of 1868 "to cross the track or tracks of any other railroad;" or from the Constitution "to cross any other railroad;" or as defined in the Act of 1871 to cross "the lines of railroads."

The appellant's so-called crossing involves the absolute destruction of certain of appellee's tracks and the exclusive occupancy of the land on which they are laid, for a distance of 1,000 feet parallel with the appellee's railroad.

In a crossing case there is no question of the right, only of the mode or manner of its exercise.

The pleadings in this case present no question of crossing. The question presented is one of the right to appropriate in the first instance, and to occupy exclusively thereafter.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has drifted from its moorings. Originally it was a bill filed in the court below by the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company against the Pittsburgh Junction Railroad Company to prevent said Company from taking, under the right of eminent domain, a portion of the property of the former Company.

The plaintiff is a railroad corporation owning and operating a line of railroad extending from Pittsburgh to Oil City, and, by means of various connections, to Buffalo, in the State of New York; and has owned and operated the same line for upwards of thirty years. The defendant is a Railroad Corporation created and organized under the Act of April 4, 1868, and its supplements. The plaintiff acquired the property in dispute long before the organization of the latter Company, and uses it for the purposes of its yard. It is occupied with numerous tracks, coal trestles, ice house, round house and other buildings convenient and necessary for its business.

The defendant is about constructing a railroad from its main line at the foot of Thirty-Sixth Street, in the City of Pittsburgh, extending along the left bank of the Allegheny River to a point at or near the mouth of Negley's Run; and also a like branch along the left bank of the Allegheny River to a point at or near the foot of Eleventh Street in said city. In pursuance of this object it surveyed and located a route through the plaintiff's yard, cutting through the coach yard, repair yard, and about twenty-four feet of the coal chute. Not being able to agree with the plaintiff, the defendant filed its bond in the court below in accordance with the Act of Assembly. Whereupon, the plaintiff filed this bill to restrain defendant from further proceeding to lay its tracks upon the location in question. The court below granted a preliminary injunction and, upon final hearing, made the injunction perpetual.

Upon the hearing before the master, the defendant abandoned its first location, and, without any action on the part of its board of directors, proceeded to relocate its road through plaintiff's yard, with a view to obviate some of the objections of the plaintiff, and lessen the injury and inconvenience to the business of the latter. The master proceeded to relocate the road, in accordance with the plan submitted by the defendant. He held that such action was justified under the Act of June 19, 1871, which provides that "If in the judgment of such court, it is reasonably practicable to avoid a grade crossing they shall, by their process, prevent a crossing at grade."

Upon exceptions to the master's report the court below held that the Act of 1871 had no application, for the reason that it referred to railroad crossings alone, while this was not a case of crossing at all, in the proper sense of the term. In this we think the learned judge was clearly right. The Act of 1871 relates to crossing of lines of railroad by other railroads. There was no attempt here to cross the line of plaintiff's road. It was an attempt to run through the plaintiff's yard, and the crossing of some of its yard tracks and switches which were merely incident to the use of its main line.

As was well observed by the court below: "The attempt is not simply to cross the yard and tracks for a common use, but absolutely to take from plaintiff a portion of its yard, for the sole use of the defendant. The issue is not in what mode the defendant should cross plaintiff's property, but solely whether it can cross at all. The right of a railroad company to corporate rights being established or admitted, the right to cross, if necessary or convenient in reaching its terminus, is absolute; and the court can only ascertain the mode. But the court must inquire and ascertain whether unnecessary injury will be done by crossing in the manner proposed, and also whether a grade crossing can reasonably be avoided; and decree accordingly." Pittsburg & C. R. R. Co. v. Southwest P. R. R. Co. 77 Pa. 178. No such issue was made in this case, and nothing suggested in the decree recommended by the master determines these questions."

We might well stop here and affirm this decree. We are in no doubt, however, as to the main question. While the franchises of a corporation are property and may be taken under the power of eminent domain, yet, when property has been already taken for one public use, by a corporation, it cannot be taken by another corporation for another use, except by express grant or by necessary implication. The principle is well settled that "The lands or right of way occupied by one railroad company for its corporate purposes cannot be taken as right of way by another railroad company, except for mere crossings; and then only for crossing purposes and not for exclusive occupancy." Pa. R. R. Co.'s App. 93 Pa. 150; Cake v. Philadelphia & E. R. R. Co. 87 Pa. 307; Houston & R. R. Co. v. Ill. & H. R. R. Co. 118 Mass. 391; Boston & Maine R. R. Co. v. Lowell & L. R. R. Co. 124 Mass. 368; Prospect Park & C. I. R. R. Co. v. Williamson, 91 N. Y. 552; St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. St. Paul, 90 Minn. 350; Central City Horse R. Co. v. Fort C. R. Co. 81 Ill. 528; Hickok v. Hine, 23 Ohio St. 528.

This rule is not confined to the track or right of way of the company, but also to the grounds occupied by all the appliances necessary for the successful operation of the road. Phila. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Williams, 54 Pa. 108; Dublin & Drogheda R. Co. v. Navan, etc. R. Co. 5 Irish Rep. Eq. 393; Prospect Park & Con. I. R. R. Co. v. Williamson and St. Paul Union Depot v. St. Paul, supra.

In Cleveland & P. R. R. Co. v. Speer, 56 Pa. 325, it was said by Justice Agnew: "A power to build side tracks is essential to the purpose and use of the road. A power to build a railroad of a single track, without the means of passing the trains or of leaving the track for the shifting of cars, or of repairs at the shops and yards, and without standing room for the cars not in motion, would be clearly wanting in all that is necessary to safety, convenience and ability, and would be vain and nugatory." See also Boston & Maine R. R. Co. v. Lowell, etc. R. R. Co. supra.

It was urged, however, on the part of the defendant, that the yard of the plaintiff is larger than is necessary for its present use; and that it could be so rearranged as to accommodate defendant's tracks and without serious detriment to the plaintiff, either in the present or the future. The evidence upon this point is conflicting and we will not discuss it. The plaintiff contends that the arrangements of its yards cannot be changed without inconvenience and loss in the handling of its business; and that its area is not greater than will be required in the near future.

We are of opinion that a railroad company has a right to consider the needs of the future, and to construct its road and make its plans with reference to those future needs. Upon this point the sayings of McKennan, J., in Lake Shore & M. S. R. R. Co. v. N. Y. C. & St. Louis R. Co. 8 Fed. Rep. 858, is sound and sensible: "Every reasonable intendment must be taken in favor of the primary rights of the complainant at the points of the alleged conflict. No actual encroachment upon these rights can be sanctioned or allowed; and, in measuring their extent, there must be a liberal consideration of the future as well as the present necessities of the complainant; touching the use of the existing tracks; the construction of additional ones; the convenient storage of its freight at all seasons, and the unembarrassed transaction of all its business."

We are not embarrassed with the question that would arise if the defendant Company could not build its road without laying its track through the plaintiff's yard. The location claimed for defendant is a matter of economy, not of necessity. It can construct its road and reach its terminus by another route. It is true it would be expensive, but it is a mere question of money and engineering skill.

It is not entitled to run through the plaintiff's yard, and cripple its facilities for handling its business, merely to save money.

Upon this point the language of our brother Gordon in Pa. R. R. Co.'s App. supra, is so clear and forcible that I may well repeat it here:

"This plea of necessity is so frequently made to cover infractions of both public and private rights, that prima facie it is suspicious and must be clearly scrutinized, especially when it is used to carry corporate privileges beyond charter limits. This plea, in the first place, must be tested by the rule, now of universal acceptance, that all Acts of incorporation and Acts extending corporate privileges, are to be construed most strongly against the companies setting them up, and that whatever is not unequivocally granted must be taken as withheld. This rule is to be taken in all its rigor where the attempt is so to construe a corporate grant as to interfere with a previous grant of the same kind. Packer v. Sunbury & E. R. R. Co. 19 Pa. 211. It is true that a franchise is property, and as such may be taken by a corporation having the right of eminent domain; but in favor of such right there can be no implication, unless it arises from a necessity so absolute that without it the grant itself would be defeated. It must also be a necessity that arises from the very nature of things, over which the corporation has no control; it must not be a necessity created by the company itself, for its own convenience or for the sake of economy. To permit a necessity such as this to be used as an excuse for the interference with or extinction of previously granted franchises would be to subject these important legislative grants to destruction on a mere pretense; in fact at the will of the holder of the latest franchise."

The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

Mr. Justice Trunkey dissenting:

I shall only indicate the ground of dissent.

This decree restrains the appellant from entering upon or in any wise interfering with the property of the appellee, situate between Forty-Third and Forty-Seventh Streets, and from entering upon, working upon or in anywise interfering with any property of the appellee between Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Streets, and on the south side of low water mark. It absolutely restrains the appellant from entering upon any part of said land to locate its road. It denies the appellant's right, even upon payment of damages, or giving security therefor. The bill prayed for such decree. It denies the appellant's right to enter at all. The opinion of the court below shows that the decree was intended to deny the right. That decree is now affirmed, and it matters not whether the location of the route was shifted after the filing of the bill, for the entry anywhere is restrained.

In this case the testimony clearly shows, and it was so found by the master, that there is ample room next the river where the appellant could lay its tracks without material injury to the property of the appellee. The inconvenience to and cost of changes by the appellee could be compensated in damages. The prudent appropriation of a parcel of land, extending from low water mark on the river to the hillside by the appellant, the whole of which land is not necessary for the use of its road, ought not to bar the construction of another railway in the valley by a company subsequently chartered.

Mr. Justice Clark concurred in the dissent.

v.

BEDFORD COUNTY BANK.

1. The absence of entry of discount of renewal notes, upon the books of a bank, will not defeat an action by the bank upon these notes.
2. The evidence in this case held sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that the notes were accepted in renewal of former ones.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Fulton County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of assumpsit upon several promissory notes. Affirmed.

At the trial before McClean, P. J., the following facts appeared:

On August 11, 1884, Moseby sent by mail to the Bank two of the notes in suit, for renewal of two notes held by the Bank, the parties to the original notes and to the renewal notes being the same, and the amount aggregating the same.

On August 27, 1884, John Dubois, the cashier of the Bank, wrote to Moseby as follows:

"The board requires me to ask a part payment of notes coming due; and therefore I will hold yours for a few days as they are and let you pay some on them, and give other notes in place of the ones you have sent us."

On September 13, 1884, the Bank suspended.

The plaintiff offered the notes, and evidence as to waiver of protest, and rested.

The defendant offered, inter alia, the following:

Discount book of plaintiff from 1877 to suspension (note Aug. 9, 1884, notes Nos. 12 and 13). No entries.

Journal of plaintiff, 1883-84, August 5, 1884, from that on, no such note.

W. L. Moseby called by defendant:

The note for $900 and $125 were sent there to be discounted by the Bank; I never received anything for them.

John Dubois, cashier of the Bank, called by the plaintiff, in rebuttal.

Shown note No. 12 for $125, dated August 9, 1884, and note No. 13 for $900, dated same day.

Witness. These notes were given for two other notes as renewals. They were sent to the Bank. My impression is that I wrote Mr. M. requesting that the notes be reduced. He did not reduce them; I think these were notes of $950, and one for $75 merged in them.

Cross examined. They were not accepted at the time when first received. I cannot speak positively whether the other notes were canceled. The books passed into the hands of the receiver September 13, 1884. I did not discount these notes on which suit is brought.

After the testimony was closed the plaintiff produced notes for $950 and $75, and offered to surrender them to the defendant.

The defendant presented inter alia the following points:

The court is respectfully requested to charge the jury (as to note No. 12 in plaintiff's statement for $125, and note No. 13 for $900) that it was the duty of the plaintiff, being a Bank and these notes being presented there for discount, to act upon them in the usual way; to present them to the board of directors for discount or refusal, and that the Bank could hold no interest in or ownership of them if discount was refused; and hence, would have no right of action upon them in this suit.

That there is no evidence in this trial that such notes were discounted.

That the letter of the cashier to the defendant, dated August 27, 1884, with the testimony of J. Dubois, the cashier, on the stand, the testimony of W. L. Moseby, the defendant, and the discount book of the Bank, all show that they were not discounted.

Answer. I decline to affirm these points, but leave the facts for your ascertainment and determination from all the evidence in the cause.

P.A.

Verdict for plaintiff and judgment thereon. The defendant thereupon took this writ.

The assignments of error were, inter alia, the answer of the court to the above points.

Messrs. W. Scott Alexander and R. Bruce Petrikin, for plaintiff in error:

The court submitted a question of law to the jury, which was clearly error.

Richardson v. Stewart, 2 Serg. & R. 84; Commonwealth v. Henderson, 1 Pen. & W. 401; Keating v. Orne, 77 Pa. 89.

Defendant was entitled to a clear and distinct instruction, so that the jury would not be misled or uninformed on this plain question of law.

Slaymaker v. St. John, 5 Watts, 27; Geiger v. Welsh, 1 Rawle, 349; Noble v. McClintock, 6 Watts & S. 58.

The first point should have been affirmed. The Bank cannot recover on notes not discounted or negotiated.

Nat. Bank of the Republic v. Perry, 2 W. N. C. 484; Parke v. Smith, 4 Watts & S. 287; Byles, Bills, top 607, note 1; Witt v. Snyder, 17 Pa. 82; Harding v. Mott, 20 Pa. 472.

It is error to submit a question to the jury, when there is no fact for them to consider.

Whitehill v. Wilson, 3 Pen. & W. 405; Cook v. Mackrell, 70 Pa. 12; Elkins v. McKean, 79 Pa. 498.

A party, upon request made to the court, is entitled to a clear and distinct instruction on the rule of law applicable to his case; and it is error in the court either to omit to give it, or give it in so imperfect a manner that the jury may be misled or left uninformed of the law.

Slaymaker v. St. John, 5 Watts, 27; Geiger v. Welsh, 1 Rawle, 349; Noble v. McClintock, 6 Watts & S. 58.

It is error to blend questions of law and fact and submit the whole to the jury.

Potts v. Wright, 83 Pa. 498.

The defendant has a full and complete defense to the original notes.

Messrs. John Stewart and Russell & Longenecker, for defendant in error:

"The mere possession of a negotiable instrument produced in evidence by the indorsee imports, prima facie, that he acquired it bona fide, for full value, in the usual course of business, before maturity and without notice of any circumstances impeaching its validity; and that he is the owner thereof, entitled to recover the full amount against all prior parties. In other words, the production of the instrument, and proof that it is genuine (when, indeed, such proof is necessary), prima facie establishes his case; and he may rest it there."

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 812.

"When disputed facts are assumed in a point propounded to the court, the refusal to charge as requested is not error."

Cullum v. Wagstaff, 43 Pa. 300; Pa. R. R. Co. v. McTigh, 46 Pa. 316; Gratz v. Beates, 45 Pa. 505.

"The same defense which the defendant might make to an action by an indorsee of the note given by him, and the same requirement of proof, may be made by him in an action on a renewal of a former note, both notes being regarded as given upon the same consideration."

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 177, 179, p. 181, ed. 1884.

"If the consideration of the original bill or note be illegal, a renewal of it will be open to the same objection and defense. * * * When a dealer at a bank pays off a note by renewal the debt is the same; the debt remains unpaid; the credit is extended."

Id. § 205, p. 210.

As bearing out this proposition we also refer to Williams v. Thomas, 1 W. N. C. 150; Shrewsberry Sav. Institution's App. 94 Pa. 309; Brown v. Scott, 51 Pa. 357.

Per Curiam:

We see no error in the answers to the points submitted by the defendant below. There was evidence showing that the notes in contention were accepted as a renewal of the former notes. It was not essentially necessary for the books to show an entry of the discount of the later notes. The case was submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

C. R. EARLEY.

1. A reserved point of law must state the facts out of which it arises.
2. Where the jury renders a verdict for plaintiff, by direction of court, subject to a reserved point of law which does not state the facts, and no exceptions are taken to the findings of fact contained in the verdict of the jury, the entry of judgment for the plaintiff, by the court, on the reserved point, will be presumed right and will be affirmed.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Elk County to review a judgment for the plaintiff on a point reserved in an action of partition. Affirmed.

The case, as it was presented to the court by the record, is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Rathbun, A. M. Brown, Thomas C. Lasear, J. McF. Carpenter and Richard A. Kennedy, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Jno. G. Hall, Henry Souther, C. H. McCauley and Charles B. Earley, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

This action of partition was brought in the Common Pleas of Elk County, by C. R. Earley, against W. B. Brickell and P. Y. Hite, to recover in severalty one third of certain lands, situate in said county, the title to which at the institution of the suit was held by the parties in common. The Central Bank of Pittsburgh, having afterwards acquired an interest in the property by purchase, was admitted to defend and the plea of non tenent inasmul was entered.

The verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff, the meaning and effect of which is that the parties hold together and in common, as set forth in the declaration; and that the plaintiff is entitled accordingly. The verdict was taken, however, "subject to the opinion of the court on the question of law reserved, whether the plaintiff is entitled to have the undivided one third part of the lands set apart to him in severalty, or one undivided ninth part only."

The facts out of which this question of law is supposed to arise are not stated, and the proper determination of it depends, we think, wholly upon the facts. The contention of the defendant in error is that the original purchase of these lands by Earley was as a trustee for Brickell, Hite, Baldwin and himself; that Baldwin's interest was subsequently purchased for the joint benefit of the others; that the unpaid purchase money, secured by the mortgage, was (as between themselves) in fact a joint indebtedness of the four purchasers and afterwards of the remaining three; and that the $25,608.21 paid by Earley on July 20, 1874, was his own money. Upon this assumption of the facts, it is argued that Brickell, Hite and Earley were, inter se, primary debtors for their own third of the purchase money only, and sureties for the other two thirds respectively; that the payment made by Earley, of his own money, would in equity be applied to his own proper debt rather than to the debt for which he was held as surety; and, as the record of the release and of the proceedings under which the marshal's sale was effected gave full notice, the release would operate as a discharge of the undivided third interest in the land, which at the time he himself owned, even as against the purchaser at that sale.

On the other hand, it is contended by the plaintiff in error that Earley's original purchase was on his own account and in his own interest; that the mortgage was given for his indebtedness; that the conveyances to Brickell and Hite are absolute in form; contain no condition or provision imposing any share of this burden upon them; that the release in question was therefore just such a discharge as in the law Earley was bound to provide for the benefit of his grantees; and as there was no specific application of the money at the time to any particular third interest in the property, Earley has no equity which would now enable him to apply the money specifically in his own relief.

The only bill of exceptions in this case is to the ruling of the court on the reserved question; and that, it is plain, does not bring up the testimony taken at the trial. We cannot draw conclusions of fact from the evidence, for the reason that the evidence is not before us. Every reservation of a question must for this reason place distinctly upon the record, not only what the point is which is reserved but the state of facts out of which it arises; this is essentially necessary to enable the parties to except to it and to have it reviewed. Ferguson v. Wright, 61 Pa. 258.

Without this a judgment non obstante verdicto cannot be entered.

The facts must be admitted of record by the parties or found by the jury. Clark v. Wilder, 25 Pa. 314; Ferguson v. Wright, supra.

When they are stated by the court, as part of the record, and no exceptions taken, it will be presumed that the parties have so agreed, and that the statement is true. Ins. Co. of Pa. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 71 Pa. 31.

The rule is well stated in Miller v. Hershey, 59 Pa. 64, as follows: "A question of law cannot arise in a judicial sense without facts. The facts out of which the question springs must be seen in the record proper, or in the superadded statute record furnished by a bill of exceptions."

This is quite as true in the case of reserved questions of law as in other cases, and has been stated in Irwin v. Wickersham and Wilson v. The Tuscarora, 25 Pa. 316, 317, and in Winchester v. Bennett, 54 Pa. 510.

There are but three modes in which facts arising upon the evidence can find their way into the record: by the finding of a jury, which is a special verdict; by the agreement of the parties, called a case stated; and by the certificate of the court, contained in a bill of exceptions. It is the last mode which is directed by the statute in the case of reserved points.

In the case at bar, the question as to the measure of the plaintiff's recovery is presented, as it were, upon the facts proved or upon the whole case; and this it has been repeatedly said is not 'good.' Roberts v. Hopkins, 11 Serg. & R. 202; Clark v. Wilder, Irwin v. Wickersham and Wilson v. The Tuscarora, supra.

The court gave the jury binding instructions to find for the plaintiff, which, as we have said, under the pleadings was equivalent to a finding that one third should be set apart to the plaintiff in severalty. To this there was no exception; and as there is nothing before us to show that the judgment rendered by the court on the point reserved was wrong, the presumption is that it was right. Leach v. Ansbacher, 28 Legal Int. 277; Miller v. Hershey, 59 Pa. 64.

The judgment is affirmed.

Andrew FRIEDEBORN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania.

Under the Act of 1794, prohibiting the performance of "any worldly employment or business whatsoever on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday," there can be only one penalty for violation of the Statute, on one day, whether the act or acts which constitute such employment are one or many. (Crepps v. Durden, 2 Cowp. 640, followed.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas of Montgomery County, to review a judgment affirming the judgment of a justice of the peace, on certiorari, imposing six penalties for violation in one day, of the Sunday Act of April 22, 1794. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. Wright Apple and Irving P. Wanger, for plaintiff in error:

From the time of the passage of the Act of April 22, 1794, until a very recent date, it was assumed by the judges of all our courts, the editors of all our digests of the laws and the legal profession generally, that one penalty only could be incurred in one day for exercising a person's business on Sunday.

PA.

In Commonwealth v. Jeandell, 2 Grant, 506, Justice Thompson says: "It has been decided that one penalty covers the combined infraction of a whole day."

This conclusion was based upon the decision of Chief Justice Mansfield in the case of Crepps v. Durden, 2 Cowp. 640, interpreting the Statute of 29 Charles II, chap. 7.

The distinction attempted to be drawn by Judge Pearson, in Duncan v. Commonwealth, 2 Pearson, 213, does not exist, as will be found by a comparison of the statutes.

The intention of the Legislature was to designate the performance of worldly employment and not the separate acts committed in that performance as constituting one of the offenses. "If any person shall do or perform any worldly employment, etc., or shall use or practice any unlawful game," etc., etc., thus stating the performance of worldly labor as one of the offenses, the use of any game, etc., as another; hunting, as another and so on. Any other construction leads to an absurdity.

Mr. Isaac Chism, for defendant in error: The title of the Act is "For the Prevention of Vice." If but one penalty is imposed, the Act does not prevent; it licenses the violation of the Sabbath.

Penal statutes must not be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the Legislature.

U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76 (18 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 37.)

In construing statutes, penal as well as others, an interpretation must never be adopted which will defeat the evident purpose of the law, if it will admit of any other reasonable construction.

The Emily and The Caroline, 9 Wheat. 381 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 116).

Such construction ought to be given as will not suffer the statute to be eluded.

Moore v. Hussey, Hobart, 98; People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 357.

There can be no rule which requires courts so to understand a penal law as to involve an absurdity or to frustrate the evident design of the law giver.

American Fur Co. v. U. S. 2 Pet. 358 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 450).

All statutes, whether remedial or penal, should be construed according to the apparent intention of the Legislature, to be gathered from the language used, connected with the subject of legislation, and so that the entire language shall have effect if it can without defeating the obvious design and purpose of the law. And in so doing the application of common sense to the language is not be excluded.

Opinion of the Judges, 22 Pick. 571; Commonwealth v. Loring and Reed v. Davis, 8 Pick. 370, 514; U. S. v. Wiltberger, supra; Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 299.

Reiff v. Commonwealth, 42 Legal Int. 90, follows Commonwealth v. Duncan, 2 Pears. 213, and there are no cases in Pennsylvania in conflict with them.

Commonwealth v. Jeandell, 2 Grant, 506, was the faintest shadow of a dictum, not a decision upon a point.

The Act 29, Car. II, was passed in 1678. The first Pennsylvania Act was the Act of 1705. It is in phraseology as to the point in question almost a copy of 29 Car. II.

Crepps v. Durden was decided in King's Bench, Trinity Term, 17 Geo. III, that is to say, in the year 1777. The Pennsylvania Legislature nine years thereafter, in passing the Act of 1786, which is the same in phraseology as to the point in question as the Act of 1794, purposely changed the wording of the Act of 1705, in order that the decision in Crepps v. Durden, should not be applicable to our statute.

"The form which the Legislature uniformly adopts, when the intention is that for each and every violation of an Act of Parliament there shall be a distinct penalty, is to impose a penalty by express words for each and every offense."

Atty-Gen. v. McLean, 1 Hurl. & C. 750.

The following cases decided that where there were also several classes or descriptions of offenses mentioned in the Act, the words "for every such offense" and "each offense" meant every repetition of any one of the classes, and did not refer to a class as a whole:

Commonwealth v. Borden, 61 Pa. 277; Commonwealth v. Cook, 50 Pa. 207; Reg. v. Scott, 83 L. J. M. C. 15; Re Hartley, 31 L. J. M. C. 232; Ex parte Beal, L. R. 3 Q. B. 387; 1 Smith, L. Cas. part 2, p. 1079; Suydam v. Smith, 52 N. Y. 888, 889; People v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 79; Johnson v. Barclay, 1 Harr. (N. J.) 1; Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. v. Moore, 33 Ohio St. 384; S. C. 81 Am. Rep. 543; Johnson v. Hud. R. R. Co. 2 Sweeney, (N. Y.) 310.

As to the importance of enforcing the laws for the observance of Sunday, see Omit v. Commonwealth, 21 Pa. 435; and Commonwealth v. Wolf, 8 Serg. & R. 50.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

There are but few of our statutes which in principle are of more importance than the Act of the 22d of April, 1794, commonly called the "Sunday Act," in that it recognizes the first day of the week as a Sabbath of rest for the well disposed and religious people of our Commonwealth; and we can entertain but little respect for those who wilfully and persistently violate its prescriptions. Against all such its penalty should be enforced until they are taught that a respect for its provisions may, at least, be profitable from a pecuniary point of view.

The fine imposed is but light; far too light, indeed, to prevent the violation of the statute by our great corporations and heavy capitalists who regard their own profit rather than the public welfare; but the correction of this defect in the law is not within our province; we can but interpret the Act as we find it.

In the case in hand it appears from the record before us that the plaintiff in error, Andrew Friedeborn, was, on the 7th of October, 1884, arrested and brought before John J. Derr, a justice of the peace for the County of Montgomery, and convicted of six several violations of the Sunday Law on one and the same day, so that the fines altogether amounted to $24.

The charge was of selling to six different persons small quantities of cigars, tobacco, cider, spruce beer and candy; and in each case the fine of $4 was imposed.

On certiorari to the common pleas these convictions were affirmed. In this we think there was error. The Act of 1794 imposes but one penalty; a fine of $4 for the violation of the Sabbath Day; and as in law, unless otherwise provided by the Legislature, there are no fractions of a day, it is clear that, by the same person, there can be but one such violation, and consequently but one fine.

Moreover, the offense consists in "performing any worldly employment or business whatsoever on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday," so that there is no prescription of any one or more distinct act or acts, but of "any employment or business," whether the act or acts which constitute such employment are one or many.

Friedeborn's business was that of a vendor of tobacco, cigars, etc., and he was not less a vendor, although on Sunday the fifth of October, he sold but one cigar; nor would he have been more so had he on that day sold all the goods of which he was possessed. In either case he was engaged in his worldly employment, and that employment could not be changed or its character altered by the number of articles sold or the time required for its performance. Nor is the construction which we thus put upon our statute a new one, for we have a ruling on the British Statute, which, so far as the offense charged in the present case is concerned, is precisely similar to our own.

The case to which we refer is that of Crepps v. Durden, 2 Cowp. 640. The action was trespass brought against a justice of the peace for issuing four warrants for the collection of four several fines imposed on the plaintiff on conviction under the Statute of 29 Car. II, chap. 7, for selling small hot loaves of bread on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday. These four several acts of selling the loaves or rolls were done on the same Sunday, and it was contended that under the Act there could be but one conviction; in other words, that the four sales constituted but one offense, and so it was held in the King's Bench. Lord Mansfield delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The first question is whether any objection can be made to the legality of the convictions before they were quashed. In order to see whether it can we will state the objection; it is this: that here are three convictions of a baker for exercising his trade on one and the same day; he having been before convicted for exercising his ordinary calling on that identical day. If the Act of Parliament gives authority to levy but one penalty, there is an end of the question, for there is no penalty at common law. On the construction of the Act of Parliament the offense is, 'exercising his ordinary trade on the Lord's Day;' and without any fractions of a day, hours or minutes. It is but one entire offense whether longer or shorter in point of duration; so whether it consist of one or many particular acts. The penalty incurred by this offense is five shillings. There can be but one entire offense on one and the same day."

It will be seen that the case in hand and that cited are so nearly alike that were it a decision of this court it must be regarded as a final determination of the contention; as it is, we regard the reasoning as so conclusive that we do not hesitate to adopt it.

The learned judge of the court below seems to have fallen into the error found in the case of Duncan v. Commonwealth (Com. Pleas of Dauphin County), 2 Pear. 213; that is to say, that the Act of 1794 and that of 29 Car. II. are in language essentially different. This is a mistake; at least so far as a case like that in hand is concerned, as will readily be discovered by a comparison of the two Acts.

The first reads: "No tradesman, artificer or any other person whatsoever shall do or exercise any worldly labor, business or work of their ordinary calling upon the Lord's Day;" the other: "If any person shall do or perform any worldly business whatsoever on the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday."

Now, as the plaintiff in error was in fact convicted of exercising worldly business in his ordinary calling on the Lord's Day, it is clear that the offense would fall as well within the Act of 29 Car. II. as within that of 1794. It is true, the latter Act embraces much more than the former, for while the one prohibits only such work or labor as is done "in the work of their ordinary calling," the other includes "any worldly employment or business whatsoever;" and this is the material difference between the two statutes, if we except the prohibition of amusements and games. Kepler v. Keefer, 6 Watts, 231; Johnson v. Commonwealth, 22 Pa. 102.

The mistake made in the court below was in holding that the Act of 1794 made every act done in any worldly employment or business a distinct and separate offense; but it does nothing of the kind; for the offense, as we have shown and as is apparent from the face of the statute, consists in the exercise of an employment or business; and either may include one or one thousand separate acts. So, in the case cited (2 Pearson); it has of necessity to be admitted that a mechanic in his shop or a farmer on his farm may work all of a Sunday, and yet be guilty of but a single breach of the statute. The farmer may plough, reap or sow, the mechanic hammer, plane or saw, through the entire day, and he is guilty of but one infraction of the law; but the merchant, although like them engaged in a single trade or calling, may be guilty of several such infractions; not because he sells several things to one person but because he sells those several things to several persons. We cannot adopt an interpretation of this kind, not because the law, were it as stated, would not be just and wholesome, but because such an interpretation is not admissible as the law now stands.

The judgment of the court below is now reversed as to all the fines against the plaintiff in error, except the first single fine of $4.

Alexander CROW, Plff. in Err.,

Wilson GREENE, et al.

A subscriber who has not paid his subscription to the stock of a proposed corporation, which has never been chartered, cannot maintain an action of assumpsit against the other subscribers on a contract made with him by all the subscribers, including himself, in the name of the proposed corporation, for the purchase of his land in consideration of the stock subscribed for by him and an additional sum in cash.

(Decided 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Fayette County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit against the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

This was a suit by Alexander Crow against Wilson Greene and forty-one others, partners under the name and style of the Gallatin Furnace & Mining Company, to recover damages for breach of a contract to purchase real estate.

The defendants pleaded "no partnership" and "non assumpsit."

At the trial before Inghram, P. J., the following facts appeared from the evidence for the plaintiff:

In the year 1876 Judge Alexander Crow was the owner of 178 acres of land in Nicholson Township, Fayette County, Pennsylvania, which was partly underlaid with valuable coal veins and with iron ore. In August, 1876, the defendants, below and in error, associated themselves together for the purpose of buying the judge's farm and establishing a blast furnace on it. Their intention was to include Judge Crow in their association, buy his farm at a certain figure, procure a charter of incorporation, issue stock and perhaps bonds, and pay the judge for his farm, in part at least, with stock or bonds.

The plan was executed to the extent of making Judge Crow an associate with them, securing his subscription to $5,000 of the stock, which it seems he never paid, and making, executing and delivering to him a written agreement to buy his farm for $23,000. This article of agreement was not under seal. It was dated August 31, 1876. It was signed by Alexander Crow of the first part and A. W. Boyd, as President of the Gallatin Furnace & Mining Company, of the second part.

At the time of the execution of this article of agreement Judge Crow was largely in debt. Judgments to the amount of from $15,000 to $18,000 stood upon the dockets of Fayette County against him, and some of them were pressing him very hard. It was supposed by the parties to the article of agreement that Judge Crow's debts would not exceed but would certainly come considerably under $18,000. It was therefore provided in the article that the parties of the second part should immediately proceed to pay and satisfy the liens against Judge Crow; that they would pay him the difference between the sum requisite to clear the dockets and $18,000 in cash, and then deliver him $5,000 in stock of the company. Judge Crow subscribed for an additional $1,000 of stock, but it seems did not pay it. A considerable amount of the other subscriptions was collected from the other stockholders.

The dower of two widows was included in the liens contemplated by this article, and it was expressly provided that the parties purchasing the land were to assume and pay all interest upon all liens and charges upon it accruing after August 31, 1876, the date when it was executed. This interest so accruing after August 31, 1876, was not to be deducted from the $23,000, but was to be provided for by the purchasers as their own debt. If Judge Crow's record debts should turn out to be in excess of $18,000, then the judge was to receive no cash from the defendants, but was to accept stock of the company at par for the difference between the amount required to pay his debts and $23,000. The par value of each share of stock was $100.

As soon as the article of agreement was signed, the parties thereto of the second part, who were the defendants, entered upon the judge's farm, in pursuance of their rights under the article; surveyed it, located their blast furnace, assumed control of the fall farming operations; and in short, carried into actual execution all the provisions of the article relating to their rights in the premises. This was all done under the eye and with the knowledge and consent of Judge Crow. Steps were taken also to procure letters patent, but the incorporation of the company was never completed.

Michael W. Franks, was the treasurer of this prospective corporation. He was one of the defendants, and in pursuance of his duties as one of the purchasers of the Crow farm, he repaired to Uniontown with money to carry out the requirements of the article concerning the judge's debts.

These transactions, in execution of the article of agreement with the plaintiff, were all authorized and carried out by the defendants, after consultation and consideration among themselves, most of which deliberations are shown by regular minutes of meetings, kept at the time, and produced in evidence at the trial.

The parties of the second part decided to avail themselves of the clause in the article contemplating the postponement by them of the payment of the record liens, upon their immediate assumption as their own proper debt of all interest demandable after August 31, 1876. Franks therefore had instructions to pay interest on the judgments. He consulted a lawyer who advised him not to pay it. He did not pay anything on the judgments or liens, nor did any of the defendants ever do so.

Judge Crow's creditors had understood during the latter part of the summer of 1876 that he was perfecting arrangements to pay his debts; and they relaxed their compulsion upon him. As time passed, however, and nothing was done towards the liquidation of their claims, they renewed their process; and on the 5th of September, 1877, his farm of 178 acres, for which the defendants had agreed to pay him $23,000, was sold under the sheriff's hammer for $8,500. Whereupon, he brought this suit.

The plaintiff closed and the defendants, offering no evidence, moved for a compulsory nonsuit. This the court granted, saying: "In the case on trial it seems that the plaintiff as well as the defendants were partners in the same company; and it is very well settled that one partner cannot sue his copartner in an action of this kind; and we think the motion for a nonsuit ought to be sustained. We have therefore made an order directing judgment of nonsuit to be entered against the plaintiff, with leave to the plaintiff to move to take off such judgment at next term."

The plaintiff subsequently moved to take off the nonsuit; but the court overruled the motion. Thereupon, the plaintiff took this writ, assigning as error the entry of the nonsuit and the refusal to take it off.

Messrs. R. P. Kennedy and Edward Campbell, for plaintiff in error :

Suppose the plaintiff to have been a partner with the defendants; it is submitted to this court, as it was maintained in the court below, that there is no rule of law and no reason preventing the recovery of plaintiff's entire claim.

Mr. Lindley, in his work on Partnership *p. 728, says : "Passing now to the subject of actions between persons who are partners in the full and proper sense of the word (this citation certainly concedes to the defendants as much as they can claim), it is proposed to inquire under what circumstances an action by one against the other will lie, and under what it will not. With reference to this inquiry it will be found useful to keep constantly in mind these questions, viz.: First, Is any matter of account involved in the dispute to which the action relates? Second, Will the damages sought to be obtained, belong, if obtained, to the firm? Third, Will such damages have to be paid out of a fund to which the plaintiff must himself contribute?"

"If these three questions can be answered in the negative, i. e., if the action can be properly tried and decided wholly irrespectively of the state of the accounts between the parties, and if the damages sought will, when recovered, belong not to the firm (including the defendant to the action) but exclusively to the plaintiff, and if he will not have to contribute to his own payment, then an action will lie, notwithstanding the parties to it are partners, and the matter relates to some partnership transaction."

On page 730 Mr. Lindley explains: "Third, an action for damages for the breach of an express agreement, entered into by one partner with another, will lie if the damages when recovered will belong to the plaintiff alone."

On page 731 he says that "Generally an action may be brought for damages sustained by any breach of an express stipulation by one partner with his copartners, if it is so framed as to admit of an action by some or one only of the partners against the partner complained of; and the damages will, when recovered, not belong as much to himself as to the plaintiffs;" and gives instances of cases where such actions may be maintained by one partner against his copartners, as follows, viz.: 1. An action for not rendering accounts and dividing profits. 2. An action for a penalty stipulated to be paid in case of a breach of agreement. 3. An action for rent covenanted to be paid. 4. An action for not indemnifying the plaintiff against a debt. 5. An action for not putting the plaintiff in funds to enable him to defray expenses as agreed.

Mr. Lindley further says: "Fourth, if a person agrees to become a partner with others and to furnish a certain amount of capital, and he makes default, they can sue him at law for damages, although he as well as they was to have had an interest in what he undertook to furnish."

No other doctrine is maintained by any authority, and this clearly authorizes the plaintiff to demand his damages from the defendants; first, because they are for the breach of an agreement made with him; second, because no matter of account is involved in the dispute to which the action relates; third, because the damages, if obtained, will not belong to the partnership, but to the plaintiff individually; and fourth, because the damages will not be payable out of any fund to which the plaintiff himself must contribute.

"As wrongs, unconnected with fraud, in the settlement of contracts or accounts are in their nature personal, partners will have the same remedies between themselves in respect to these matters as other persons have."

Coll. Partn. p. 346, § 392.

"Wherever there is an express stipulation in the partnership articles, which is violated by any partner, an action at law, either assumpsit or covenant, as the case may require, will ordinarily lie to recover damages for the breach thereof."

Story, Partn. p. 350, § 218.

No other doctrine is known to the law, and the following cases show its application:

Kilpatrick v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co. 49 Pa. 118; Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 43; Scotts App. 88 Pa. 178.

In the case of Wicks v. Lippman, in the Supreme Court of Nevada decided in October, 1878, 13 Nev. 499, Mr. Chief Justice Hawley, delivering the opinion of the court, says that an action at law can be maintained by one partner against another, to recover a balance due, whenever the adjustment of the matter in controversy does not involve the settlement of any partnership account:

Pars. Partn. 284; Adams v. Funk, 53 Ill. 219; Russell v. Grimes, 46 Mo. 411.

That the measure of damages is the price which the defendants agreed to pay for the land, the plaintiff in error considers settled by the decisions of this court.

In Tripp v. Bishop, 56 Pa. 424, 427, Mr. Justice Strong delivering the opinion of this court says: "If the contracting parties have done all that the statute requires (i. e., to comply with the Statute of Frauds) there is no reason why a purchaser should not be held to pay what he promised; or, in other words, why the price he undertook to pay is not the measure of damages for this breach of his contract."

To the same effect are Dentler v. Brown, 11 Pa. 295; Garrard v. Lantz, 12 Pa. 186, 192, 198; Addams v. Tutton, 39 Pa. 447, and Zimmerman v. Galbraith, 82 Pittsb. Legal Jour. 446.

Messrs. Boyle & Mestrezal, for defendants in error:

Mr. Lindley says that an action between partners will lie if the damages when recovered will belong to the plaintiff alone, but will not lie if the damages have to be paid out of the fund to which the plaintiff must himself contribute. In the case at bar the plaintiff, being a partner, would be liable to contribute his share of any damages that were sustained by a breach of this contract; hence, under the authority cited, he cannot maintain this action.

It is well settled that one partner cannot sue his copartners in an action at law, except in account render, for or about a partnership adventure, unless they have settled their accounts and struck a balance, or the partnership was limited to a single transaction.

Mr. Smith, in his work on Mercantile Law, p. 70, states the principle and then gives the following reason: "The reason for which seems to be that a court of law could not in such cases do complete justice, since the forms of an action would not permit it to enter on such an investigation of the entire state of the partnership accounts as would be necessary in order to ascertain the fair and real claims of the contracting parties."

In this State this principle has been established and reiterated in all the cases.

Ozeas v. Johnson, 1 Binn. 191; Andrews v. Allen, 9 Serg. & R. 241; McFadden v. Hunt, 5 Watts & S. 463; Hall v. Logan, 63 Pa. 335; Kyerr v. Hoffman, 65 Pa. 126; Leidy v. Messinger, 71 Pa. 177; Schnatterly v. Crow, 2 Lan. Law R. 126.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

Conceding that although none of the defendants except Boyd signed the agreement in suit, they are nevertheless to be treated as partners because they were members of a proposed corporation which never organized; yet they were partners, if at all, jointly with the plaintiff. He was one of the largest subscribers to the stock of the company and represented a much larger proportion of the capital of the concern than many of the defendants.

The contract was for the purchase of property to be used for the purposes of the company or partnership. The business to be carried on upon the premises was a joint or partnership business. Upon the theory of a partnership, the plaintiff was certainly liable to contribute, in proportion to the extent of his interest, to whatever funds were required for the uses of the partnership. If the firm owed debts, we know of no reason why he should not ratably contribute to their liquidation. On the other hand, if they realized profits, it is equally certain he would be entitled to his proportionate share.

The theory upon which the action is based is that there was an actual partnership in legal effect, and without that theory of course there could be no recovery. But if there was a partnership, we find nothing in this record to show that the ordinary law of partnership is inapplicable to the relations of these parties to each other. The obligation to share losses as well as gains, to contribute jointly with the others to the funds requisite to meet the liabilities of the partnership, is one of the most important and fundamental duties of the relation. This being so we cannot understand why, if a recovery is had in this action, the plaintiff should not be required to contribute to the payment of the money recovered. We are not informed of any fact which relieves him of that duty. No authority has been cited to show that in such a case that duty does not arise. The decisions cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff do not touch this question.

The citation from Lindley expressly excepts the case of a recovery of damages which must be paid out of a fund to which the plaintiff must contribute. It is entirely undisputed that there has never been any settlement of partnership accounts between the plaintiff and defendants. The latter, if liable at all, are only liable because they are members of a partnership known as The Gallatin Furnace & Mining Company. It is that company only that is named in the contract upon which the suit is brought. None of the defendants are named in that contract and none of them signed it or purported to sign it.

But if the defendants are liable because they were subscribers to the stock of that company, the plaintiff is liable for the same reason. Suppose, then, a right of recovery be conceded in this case; for what amount shall the verdict be rendered? If for the whole amount of the contract price, most certainly the defendants could file a bill against the plaintiff, to compel him to contribute his proportion.

But why should these defendants, who are a part only of the members of the partnership, pay to the plaintiff, who is also a member, the whole of a debt for the payment of which he is jointly liable with them? Such a result would certainly be inequitable and contrary to every principle and precedent in the law of partnership. If, on the other hand, the verdict should be rendered only for such proportion of the whole amount of the purchase money as the defendants ought to pay, what is the amount of that proportion? That, of course, would depend upon the adjustment of partnership accounts. It is alleged that the plaintiff contributed nothing to the partnership. Mr. W. Franks testified: "The money had been collected of the stockholders. I don't know that Judge Crow ever paid any of his subscription. I don't think he ever paid the extra thousand. I would have known if he had. Judge was present at the meetings and was recognized as a stockholder."

It appeared from other testimony that a considerable amount of the subscriptions had been collected from the stockholders other than the plaintiff. How much, then, of the present liability should be paid by the defendants and how much by the plaintiff? Who can tell, or how can that matter be determined? Of course it can only be determined by a bill in equity, for the settlement of the partnership affairs and the adjustment of the accounts between the partners. But there is no pretense that anything of that kind has ever taken place between these parties. We find it impossible to conceive of any reason why that course should not be adopted in the present case.

There never was a contract by which these particular defendants agreed to pay to this particular plaintiff any sum of money whatever for any purpose. Their liability as individuals to make any such payment is a derivative liability, resulting from a joint relation with the plaintiff which imposes the same liability upon him. It is not necessary to enlarge upon this subject. The case comes within the perfectly familiar rule that one partner cannot sue another partner for a partnership transaction, except by bill in equity or action of account render. Some of the Pennsylvania authorities are the following: Ozens v. Johnson, 1 Binn. 191; Hall v. Logan, 34 Pa. 331; McFadden v. Hunt, 5 Watts & S. 468; Leidy v. Messinger, 71 Pa. 177; Schnatterly v. Crow, 2 Lan. Law R. 126.

Judgment affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA R. R. CO., Appl.,
v.

George F. MISH et al.

1. A railroad company cannot appropriate and use a street or public highway for the laying of the tracks of its trunk line, switches, sidings or branches, unless the power is given expressly or by necessary implication.
2. A statute which authorized a railroad company to take lands for the construction of a railroad, with no other provision as to public highways except a requirement compelling it to make and keep in repair good and sufficient passages at the crossings of the highway, will not authorize the occupation of a public road longitudinally.
3. A statute conferring authority upon a railroad company to take lands, tenements or property necessary to straighten or improve the lines of railroads leased or owned, and the construction of the needful appurtenances thereto, does not extend the branching powers of the original road to its leased lines, or authorize the taking of a public street for tracks from the main lines to mills and factories.
4. A party who is specially injured is entitled to an injunction to restrain a nuisance, without proving the amount of damage.
5. One who has his dwelling fronting on a street unlawfully occupied by a railroad company, held, to be specially injured.
6. A wrong doer may not set off benefits to prevent the injured party obtaining relief.
7. Bill in equity to enjoin construction of railway track on highway, and for other relief, will support decree requiring removal of track laid after notice of the proceedings.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPEAL by defendant, from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin County, in favor of complainants, property holders on a street, in a suit to restrain a Railroad Company from appropriating a public street for its tracks, and to compel it to take off tracks as laid. Affirmed.

The assignments of error specified by the appellant were in the action of the court:

1. In holding that plaintiffs had such standing as to entitle them to remedy by injunction, having neither alleged in their bill nor proved any special damage or irreparable injury.
2. In holding and decreeing that the defendant had not the power, under its charter and supplements, to appropriate the street as it did.
3. In decreeing the final injunction against the defendant.
4. In so shaping the decree as to require the defendant to take up the siding and tracks as laid, there being no prayer for such a decree in the plaintiffs' bill.

5. In stating that the complainants have sustained irreparable injury, there being no such allegation in the bill.

Messrs. Hall & Jordan, for appellant:

The remedy here sought is never granted, unless there was a clear right which was violated, resulting in irreparable injury; and where there is no adequate remedy at law.

An injunction against such an erection will be refused, upon the principle that private advantage must yield to public benefit.

That the complainants have no standing to sustain an injunction, see Snyder v. Pa. R. R. Co. 55 Pa. 340; Duncan v. Pa. R. R. Co. 94 Pa. 485.

They have sustained no such special damage as would enable them to maintain an injunction.

Heller v. Atchison, Topeka, etc. R. R. Co. 7 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 636.

"The mere existence of a steam railroad, together with the passing of trains thereon, is not per se a nuisance."

Hentz v. Long I. R. R. Co. 13 Barb. 646.

"Nor is the tunneling in a street by a railroad company considered as a departure from the original public use, entitling the abutting property owners to damages."

Plant v. Long I. R. R. Co. 10 Barb. 26; Adams v. Saratoga & W. R. R. Co. 11 Barb. 414.

If the laying of a railroad track occasioned actual and substantial damage to property, which the law provides compensation for, a party would have a remedy at law. If no such damage was sustained, there is no remedy, either at law or equity.

That an injunction will not lie in such a case as this appears from Getz's App. 10 W. N. C. 453 and cases there cited.

The rule requiring complainants to show a special injury, peculiar to themselves and distinct from the general inconvenience experienced by the public, is inflexible.

Annoyances arising from the use of a railroad is not a nuisance per se. The fact of nuisance in such case must be determined by a jury.

Bell v. Ohio & Pa. R. R. 25 Pa. 161; 8 Dana, 269.

The construction of a railroad will not be enjoined at the suit of an adjacent lot owner, who simply owns up to the line of the street, and over whose land the road did not pass, where no special damage is alleged and shown to the complainant different from that to other property owners.

In the absence of any allegation of irreparable injury, an injunction will not be granted against the construction of streets or roads, since, without such injury, no sufficient reason exists for seeking relief in an equitable, rather than a legal form.

Holmes v. Jersey, 1 Beas. 299.

When the injury complained of is only such as is incident to a lawful business, conducted in the ordinary way, equity will not interfere; thus an injunction will be refused against the injury and annoyance caused by the smoke from coal, etc.

Commonwealth v. Pittsburg, etc. R. R. Co. 24 Pa. 159.

Sanford v. R. R. Co. 24 Pa. 378, establishes the principle that courts of equity in Pennsylvania have complete control of corporations chartered by the State and will interfere to restrain them, the moment they go beyond the power which the Legislature has given them; and in a mistaken exercise of those powers they will interfere with the property of individuals.

That the Legislature may authorize a railroad company to construct its road upon and along a public street is not questioned. But the power to do so must appear in express terms, or by clear and necessary implication. All powers not given in this direct and unmistakable manner are withheld.

Commonwealth v. Erie, etc. R. R. Co. 27 Pa. 389; Pa. R. R. Co.'s App. 93 Pa. 150.

In Mayor, etc. of Pittsburgh v. Pa. R. R. Co. 48 Pa. 355, it was held that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, under its charter and supplements, could occupy streets along the route of the main line; but no Act of Assembly gives this power to its leased lines. The general language of the Act of 1867 certainly does not.

The word "property" does not embrace public streets and highways.

Cake v. Phila. & Erie R. R. Co. 87 Pa. 307.

In Cleveland, etc. R. R. Co. v. Speer, 56 Pa. 325, the charter authorized the company to continue its road up a certain valley to Pittsburg; and as the town mentioned extended clear across the valley, the road must necessarily pass through it. Hence, the strong implication that the company might use the street, and not from the employment of the term "land" in the charter.

Brocket v. Ohio & Pa. R. R. Co. 14 Pa. 241, interpreting the phrase "any land," simply decides that it embraces a dwelling house; and does not so much as hint that it would cover a public highway.

Courts of equity are expressly authorized to inquire, at the instance of private parties, whether corporations have the legal right to do the acts by which it is alleged complainants are injured, and to enjoin the corporation if it is exceeding its power.

Act of June 19, 1871, P. L. 1860; Western Pa. R. R. Co.'s App. 104 Pa. 899.

Mr. Justice Trunkley delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 77 of the Act of June 9, 1832, authorized the Portsmouth & Lancaster Railroad Company to locate and construct a railroad of one or more tracks from Portsmouth to a point west of the City of Lancaster, and connecting with the Pennsylvania Railroad, and to construct all the appendages necessary for the convenience of said company in the use of said railroad. And section 81 made it the "duty of said company to construct and keep in repair good and sufficient passages across the said railroad, where any public roads shall intersect and cross the same."

Section 78 authorized said company to enter upon any lands for the purpose of surveying and locating the route, and after determining the route to enter upon, take possession of and use the lands for the purpose of constructing said road. And sections 79 and 80 provided the mode of ascertaining the damages where the said company could not "agree with the owner or owners of such required land for the purchase thereof."

The supplemental Act of March 11, 1835, authorized said company to construct an extension of the railroad from Portsmouth to Harrisburg, and extended all such provisions of the Act of 1832 as were applicable, to the locating and maintaining of the construction of said extension of said railroad.

The Act of April 10, 1867, empowered the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, "from time to time, as they may deem necessary, to construct and use, along, adjoining or contiguous to, their lines of railroad, or the line of railroads now owned or leased or that may be hereafter owned or leased by them, additional tracks, sidings, depots, turnouts, water ways, workshops and other appurtenances requisite and needful for the prosecution of their business, and for the accommodation and transportation of the trade and traffic over and upon the said railroads; and they are hereby also authorized and empowered to straighten and improve the said lines of railroads and to construct the needful appurtenances thereto; and for all and any of such purposes, the company shall and may enter upon, acquire, take and appropriate such lands, tenements and property along, adjoining or contiguous to said railroads or elsewhere that they may deem necessary for the purpose of straightening or improving of the said railroads and constructing the needful appurtenances thereto."

The foregoing are statutory or charter provisions relating to the fundamental question in issue, namely: Has the appellant the right to occupy longitudinally a public road or street in a borough for the laying of its railway tracks? Reference was made to the Statute of March 17, 1869, to enable railroads, canal and slack-water navigation companies to straighten, widen, deepen and otherwise improve their lines and works; but the statute confers no greater power on railroads than was conferred on the appellant by the Statute of April 10, 1867. In passing, it may be noted that the learned master referred to the provisions relative to the occupancy of streets, in the General Railroad Laws of 1849 and 1868, in terms which might be understood that those provisions are part of the charter of the appellant, or of its road held by lease; but at the argument no such position was taken. Indeed, the provision is alluded to in appellant's argument, but not as if to be read into its charter. A company organized under the general statute may locate its railroad on a street or alley, because that statute expressly confers the power.

That the Legislature may authorize a railroad company to lay its tracks on a public street has not been doubted since the decision in the Phila. & Trenton R. R. Co.'s Case, 6 Whart. 25.

It ought to be equally free of doubt that when not authorized by legislative grant a railroad company has no right to appropriate and use a street or public highway for the laying of the tracks of its trunk line, switches, sidings or branches. And the power must be given in plain words or by necessary implication. Commonwealth v. Erie & N. E. R. R. Co. 27 Pa. 339; Pa. R. R. Co.'s App. 93 Pa. 150.

The course of legislation in Pennsylvania, relative to railroads, shows continuous care to protect the public roads from the grasp of railroad companies, except upon terms that they render an equivalent to the public. A fair example is the legislation upon this point for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. At first the Act of April 18, 1846, provided that when necessary to cross or intersect any established road or way, said Railroad Company should so construct its road as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or property along said established road or way. This being the only provision in the Act of incorporation relative to public roads, in force thereof it would have been exceedingly difficult, in accord with the rules of interpretation, to construe the general terms authorizing the taking of land, to authorize the taking of an established road and laying the track thereon longitudinally. Therefore, supplemental Acts were passed providing that when said Company should find it necessary to change the site of any turnpike or public road or any street, lane or alley, in any town, borough or city, it should reconstruct the same forthwith, on the most favorable location, and in as perfect a manner as the original road.

In this connection it may be remarked that the charter authorized the making of such lateral railroads or branches, leading from the main line to such points in the counties through which the main line may pass as the president and directors may deem advantageous, subject to the provisions and conditions relative to the main line; and hence, when it was ruled in Mayor, etc. of Pittsburgh v. Pa. R. R. Co. 48 Pa. 855, that said Company, within the designated counties, had as large powers to make branches as it had to make the main line, and could construct a branch through the city of Pittsburgh, by a route best suited to promote the convenience of the inhabitants of the city and the interest of the Company, the ruling accorded with the precise terms of the charter. That case is no precedent for enlarging corporate grants by construction.

It has been said with reference to charters of incorporation, that "whatever is doubtful is decisively certain against the corporation." There seems no occasion to apply that rule in this case. Nothing in the statute relating to the powers of the Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mount Joy & Lancaster Railroad Company shows an intentment that the company should have a right to lay its tracks lengthwise on other public highways.

Of course, it would be necessary in the construction of the railroad, to intersect and cross other highways, and the charter compels the company to make and keep in repair good and sufficient passages at such crossings. This express provision left no room for doubt as to any kind of occupancy of public roads not mentioned. What is not plainly expressed or necessarily implied is not granted.

Nor is the meaning of the Act of April 10, 1867, doubtful. It contains no expression respecting public roads or streets. It does not extend the branching power of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the lines it holds by lease. In view of the previous legislation relative to these companies the words "lands, tenements and property" are not used in a new sense which includes established roads. By the letter of the statute, lands and property may be taken for work shops as well as railway tracks. This is reasonable when applied to private property; but if public roads and streets are included as property which may be taken for work shops, the Act is unique and a wild departure from the line of legislation relative to these railroad companies.

The appellant admits that when the bill was filed it was about "to construct a railway track or siding on and along the bed of said Brown Street from the point where said street touches the main line of said road, intersecting Union Street, and passing by and along the whole length of the properties on said Brown Street owned by your orators respectively."

The master finds that "The track or siding, which is a continuation of the siding that existed before, extends along Brown Street, a distance of 100 feet, from the railroad to Canal Street and to within 150 feet of the canal, where the street terminates;" and that a number of factories, mills and business houses are in the vicinity of the terminus at Canal Street. One of the witnesses called by the defendant testifies that he has urged this siding for years, because of the necessities for business; because it will benefit the town; that its continuation to his land would benefit the whole town; an extension of this track would open up business sites, and this is the first the Pennsylvania Railroad has done in that direction.

Whether this railway track be called a siding or some other name, it is easy to ascertain that it is laid on Brown Street, from the main line to a point in the vicinity of mills, factories and places of business. That it is a benefit to the business of that part of Middletown is undeniable. No doubt were it extended further, land in the southeast part of the town would be enhanced in value.

This inquiry is not respecting the main line which has been laid for many years, nor the laying of additional tracks alongside that line; nor the right of the appellant to construct sidings, turnouts, depots or work shops; nor the right of the appellant to construct a railroad from its main line to mills and places of business in the southeast part of the town; but it is whether it can lawfully take and occupy a street from the main line to mills and factories. As already seen, it cannot.

This case differs widely from Gate's Appeal, 10 W. N. C. 458. In that, it was denied that the railroad had the right to construct the siding at all. The plaintiff's chief complaint was the injury done by taking part of his lot, destroying his dwelling house and obstructing his way to the street; but it was not contended that if the charter gave the right to construct the siding it did not give the right to construct it on the street.

In Cleveland & P. R. R. Co. v. Speer, 56 Pa. 326, upon the grant in the charter, and the route authorized therein, it was said that the implication was irresistible that the company could use Preble Street for the tracks of its railroad. Stress was put on the fact that the railroad had been constructed for years before the beginning of the suit, and it was said:

"Whatever private remedies individuals might have had, to prevent the location there and to compel a change of site before consummation, it is now too late to treat the location as a mere nullity." And if the act of location was "voidable because other ground ought to have been taken, none but the Commonwealth can now call the company to account for it."

That suit was when a party had no remedy for injury to his property, if none was taken, by the laying of a railroad at grade on a street in front of his dwelling. And it was before the Act of June 19, 1871, which provides that in all proceedings, at law or in equity, in which it is alleged that the private rights of individuals are injured or invaded by any corporation claiming to have the right to do the act from which such injury results, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire and ascertain whether such corporation possesses the right to do the act; and if such right has not been conferred, if the suit be in equity, the court shall restrain such injurious acts by injunction; if at law, the party may recover damages for such injury. In that case the switches complained of were within the lines of Preble Street until they reached the land owned by the railroad company.

It is urged that the plaintiffs are not entitled to injunction because they have not suffered irreparable injury. This would be sound if the defendant had right to lay the track on the street. But having no such right the case is different. Where railroad companies or individuals exceed their statutory powers in dealing with other people's property, no question of damages is raised, when an injunction is applied for. Commonwealth v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. R. Co. 24 Pa. 159.

True, the Company has not taken the plaintiffs' property; and if the plaintiffs have not been specially injured, they are not entitled to injunction. But if the defendant, without authority from the State, creates a nuisance on the street, one who is specially injured is entitled to relief, without proving the amount of damage. In such case, the defendant is not in the position of a person who carries on a business lawful in itself, of which a neighbor complains. It is not on its own land. If not empowered to use the street, it has no more right to construct a railroad on it than any other person. A wrong doer may not set off benefits to prevent the injured party obtaining relief, a man is not to be driven from his home by offensive structures, or compelled to sell it even for more than its value, by one who is not invested with power to injure or take it for public purposes. As this case comes, it is wholly immaterial whether the railroad has increased the market value of the plaintiffs' dwellings. They are not claiming damages.

All persons who merely travel on Brown Street suffer the same kind of inconvenience or injury, although the suffering may differ in degree. But he who has his dwelling fronting on the street; who cannot turn his carriage between the front of his lot and the rails; who must drive around a block because he cannot turn in the street; whose business as a physician is interfered with, or who is subject to the smoke, noise and other incidents of railway trains passing near his door, suffers a special injury which differs in kind as well as degree from that done to the mere traveller.

Were the road lawfully constructed the only question would be whether the plaintiffs' lots were worth more or less by reason of the construction; and if so how much.

This bill was properly filed and the plaintiffs prayed that the "defendant, its servants, agents and workmen may be restrained by injunction from constructing said railway track, or maintaining the same upon said public highway." And they prayed other relief. If the defendant went on and laid the track after notice of this proceeding it has no reason to complain of a decree which puts the plaintiffs in the situation they were in when they asked preliminary injunction. No remedy is complete that does not require removal of the track laid since the defendant had notice of the action.

And now it is considered and decreed that the decree of the court below be and is affirmed; that the appeal be dismissed at costs of the appellant, and record remitted, that the decree be enforced.

Elizabeth A. BAY'S APPEAL.

1. In divorce proceedings when the evidence shows that the greatly preponderating degree of blame and misbehavior was on the part of the wife, even though the husband was not entirely free from blame, such fault does not constitute a legal bar to his obtaining a divorce; and if the wife's treatment is such as to render his condition intolerable and life burdensome, a divorce should be granted.
2. Where the testimony fully warranted the jury in finding as facts that the respondent had rendered the condition of the libelant intolerable and his life burdensome, and that she was possessed of no separate estate when the marriage took place, and was then a widow well advanced toward middle life, and that she had agreed before marriage that her share in the libelant's estate, in case of his death, should be $8,000, in lieu of dower, his estate being productive property amounting to $100,000, held,

(a) That an allowance of $800 per annum for alimony and $500 for costs and expenses of respondent in conducting her defense, including counsel fees, was quite as liberal as she was entitled to receive.

(b) That it was not error in the court below to refuse to add to or to increase the allowance after final decree.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a decree of the Common Pleas of Dauphin County, granting a divorce and giving alimony and allowance for costs, etc. Affirmed.

James G. M. Bay filed his libel in divorce against Elizabeth A. Bay, on the grounds of cruel and barbarous treatment rendering the condition of the libelant intolerable and life burdensome. An issue was directed and the case tried before Simonton, P. J.

After the appearance of the respondent on application of her counsel for allowance the court made the following order:

"Nov. 3, '84. It is ordered that the libelant, James G. M. Bay, pay to the respondent or her attorney, within ten days after notice of this order, $100 for counsel and preparing her defense, with leave before trial to move for further allowance."

On the trial the libelant testified that for many weeks during the two years preceding the application for divorce the respondent failed to get him his meals; that she frequently used the most approbrious epithets towards him; that she repeatedly threw tumblers, cups and buckets of coal at him, and upon two occasions a kettle full of boiling water.

He also called a number of witnesses who corroborated him in many of the above statements. One witness testified that she saw the respondent run at him with a butcher knife. Another witness heard the respondent declare that she would "shoot him, by God."

The respondent, on the other hand, testified that the libelant had choked her; had crushed her hands over a pair of shears thereby maiming them for life; that he had often struck her on the head, and did not supply a sufficiency of food to enable her to prepare the meals. She also alleged that he undertook to smother her with escaping gas.

Several witnesses called by the respondent testified that they had seen some marks and bruises upon her neck.

The libelant, upon being recalled, declared that the respondent had knocked the gas jet off with a chair and had offered to run the shears through him, whereupon he took them away from her, using no more violence than was absolutely necessary.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

We are further asked to charge by the respondent's counsel that "If a husband apply ing for a divorce is guilty of the same things which he alleges against his wife, his prayer will not be granted. It is not sufficient that the plaintiff is less faulty than the defendant; he must come into court with clean hands and without fault." We decline so to instruct you.

[We say, further, if you believe from all the evidence that the husband was not wholly free from fault, but that his fault was comparatively light, and provoked by his wife, such fault would not be a bar to a verdict; and this we say to you in connection with the last point that was presented by the counsel for the respondent. The law is not as there claimed, that the husband must be entirely without fault. He may not have acted entirely as he ought to have done; but if his fault was comparatively light, and if the greatly preponderating degree of blame and misbehavior was on the part of the wife, even though he was not entirely free from blame, that would not be a legal bar to his obtaining a divorce.]

The jury found for the libellant.

During the trial of the cause, application was made for increase of allowance, but the matter did not come up for consideration until afterwards. On this hearing the respondent showed, by depositions taken for the purpose, that the libellant was the owner of productive property of the value of $100,000.

The libellant on the other hand produced an antenuptial agreement which provided that "In the event of his death Mrs. E. A. Galbraith is to receive of his estate, real or personal, the sum of $8,000 in lieu of her legal rights, as his widow, to all rights of dower or other rights accorded a widow."

The competency and relevancy of this paper were objected to by the respondent because it had been fraudulently obtained by the husband and because it only purported to regulate or affect matters in the event of the death of James G. M. Bay, which event had not occurred. The court, however, received the paper and ordered it to be filed.

On November 4, 1885, the court filed a decree, of which the following are the material portions:

"Considering that the wife is the respondent in this case, and that the testimony fully warranted the finding of the jury, that she had rendered the condition of the libellant intolerable and his life burdensome, and that she was possessed of no separate estate when the marriage took place; and that she was then a widow well advanced toward middle life; and that she agreed before marriage that her share of the libellant's estate, in case of his death, should be $8,000, in lieu of dower; and understanding that, in a case such as this, the principal reason for the requirement of the statute (that the husband being the libellant, and making out his case, shall be decreed to pay alimony) is that the respondent may be maintained at his expense rather than be permitted to become a charge upon the public; and having respect to the circumstances of the libellant, we think that an allowance of $800 per annum will be just and proper. * * * Libellant will also, in addition to the $100 already decreed and paid, pay the further sum of $400, to respondent or her attorneys, for costs and expenses in conducting her defense, and for counsel fees. * * *

On November 10, 1885, a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony was entered and on November 16, 1885, the respondent took this appeal and issued certiorari. Subsequently, on December 1, 1885, after bail had been entered, appeal taken and writ issued and served, the respondent's counsel moved the court to make a further order on plaintiff for maintenance of the defendant and also for cost of paper book and reasonable allowance for counsel to prepare and argue the case in the supreme court.

This order the court declined to make, "having already made a final order and decree in the case."

The assignments of error were: 1, the answer of the court to the above point and the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets; 2, the order of court on November 8, 1884, above quoted, fixing the allowance for counsel fees and preparing defense; 3, the admission and consideration of the antenuptial agreement; and 4, the refusal of the court, after final decree, to make an additional allowance.

Messrs. Hall & Jordan, for appellant:

This suit is for divorce by the husband against his wife for her alleged "cruel and barbarous treatment" to him, under the Act of May 8, 1854, which increases the causes of divorce and which provides as follows:

"Where the wife shall have, by cruel and barbarous treatment, rendered the condition of her husband intolerable or life burdensome; Provided; That in case of divorce under this Act if the application shall be made on the part of the husband, the court granting such divorce shall allow such support or alimony to the wife as her husband's circumstances will admit of and as the court may deem just and proper."

1 Purd. Dig. p. 613.

Cruel and barbarous treatment has been frequently defined by our courts, as "actual personal violence or the reasonable apprehension of it, or such a course of treatment as endangers life or health and renders cohabitation unsafe."

Butler v. Butler, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329; Gordon v. Gordon, 48 Pa. 226, 238; Hush. Mar. Women, 199, 200; Harris' App. 2 W. N. C. 831.

In Gordon v. Gordon, supra, it is clearly intimated that this principle will be more strictly enforced against the husband than against the wife.

The evidence does not show that any actual injury or violence was ever inflicted upon him by her at any time.

"Mere want of sympathy, disagreeable manners, ebullitions of ill temper, habitual disregard of her feelings, refusal to protect her from the insults of others; all these, although nearly as brutal as blows, are not to be taken as just cause for separation."

Breinig v. Meitzler, 23 Pa. 156, 160.

"Recrimination is a counter charge, by the defendant, of a cause for divorce against the complainant. When each party has a cause for divorce, neither can obtain a divorce. Recrimination is a showing by the defendant of any cause of divorce against the plaintiff in bar of the plaintiff's cause of divorce."

Stew. Mar. & Div. § 318, and the host of authorities there cited.

"Divorce is a remedy provided for an innocent party * * * if both parties have a right to divorce neither has; and a guilty party cannot claim relief; the parties being in pari delicto must be left to themselves."

Id. § 814; 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 76, 78, 93.

The statute under which this divorce is sought expressly declares that "The Court granting such divorce shall allow such support or alimony to the wife as her husband's circumstances will admit of;" and this is not a mere matter of discretion in the court below, but a matter of right and the subject of review.

"The order of alimony is part of the final decree; and when brought up by appeal is, with all the evidence, the subject of the jurisdiction of the supreme court."

McChurg's App. 66 Pa. 386; Miles v. Miles, 76 Pa. 357.

The amount or quantum of alimony is not fixed by the statute; but is the subject of sound legal discretion, under the well established legal principles relating thereto. And it is surprising with what uniformity these general principles prevail and are applied, both in England and in the several States.

Stew. Mar. & Div. § 358.

In the present English matrimonial court one third of the husband's income is taken as a sort of standard "matter of course proportion" to be allowed to the wife for permanent alimony.

2 Bish. Mar. & Div. §§ 463, 464, 513; Stewart, § 375.

"Where the wife brings no means to the marriage, and derives none by inheritance afterwards, and whatever there is was accumulated through the efforts of the husband, it is not proper, on granting the wife a divorce, to give her part of the husband's real estate in fee. The alimony in such case should not exceed one half the husband's income."

Wilson v. Wilson, 102 Ill. 297.

"The application (for alimony) was not usually made in the divorce libel, but in the shape of a separate petition, alleging the husband's faculties, filed * * * in the case of permanent alimony, usually after the court's decision as to the divorce, but before the judgment, though the application could also be made at any time afterwards."

Stew. Mar. & Div. § 362.

It (alimony) may also be granted, according to the different practice, by the lower court, or by the appellate court, pending the appeal. And counsel fees may be allowed, even after the determination of the suit.

Id. §§ 385, 391.

The principle here contended for by the appellant is sustained by Wood v. Wood, 7 Lans. 204, because here the application was formally made and insisted upon.

Messrs. J. C. McAlarney and A. J. Herr, for appellee:

The court properly qualified the fourth point of the respondent, by declaring that if the libellant's "conduct was comparatively light and provoked by the respondent, such faults would not be a bar to a verdict."

This court has already plainly indicated its views in cases almost identical with the one in hand, and we rely with confidence on Jones v. Jones, 66 Pa. 494, and Richards v. Richards, 1 Grant, 389.

In this State there is no rigid rule as to the amount of alimony. It will be fixed by the court, according to the circumstances of the parties and the degree of blame to be attached to either and as the courts may deem just and proper.

The wealth of the husband can only be made the standard where his conduct calls for condemnation or when the wife's conduct is such as to commend her to the sympathy or conscience of the court.

Per Curiam:

The issue was submitted to the jury in a clear and correct charge. The evidence justifies the verdict. Under all the facts, the sum decreed as alimony, and for costs and expenses of the appellant in conducting her defense, including counsel fees, are quite as liberal as she is entitled to receive from the appellee. There is no error in refusing to add to or increase the sum, after final decree. The amount which the counsel of the appellant may justly demand of her is not now decided.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

George W. STRINE, Late Sheriff of Northumberland County, Plff. in Err.,

v.

William H. FOLTZ & BRO.

The Act of March 23, 1877, authorizing any of the prothonotaries and sheriffs of the several counties of the Commonwealth, within six years after the expiration of their official term of office, to sue anyone residing out of the county, before a justice of the peace, within the county, for fees for official services, before or after judgment; authorizing constables to appoint deputies (in the county where the defendant resides) to execute the writ; providing for execution in any county in the Commonwealth; and making a certificate of the prothonotary of the county where suit is brought prima facie evidence that such fees are lawfully due and correct, held, to be special legislation and unconstitutional under article III, § 7 of the Constitution.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Northumberland County, to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Justice Court in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover certain fees as a sheriff. Affirmed.

The only question raised is as to the constitutionality of the Act of March 23, 1877 (P. L. 25), under which the action was brought which, with the facts of the case, is set out in the opinion.

Reported below, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 490*

*The opinion of the court below, by ROCKEFELLER, P. J., was as follows, after stating the facts: Doubtless the Act of Assembly in question was intended to remedy a seeming hardship. The officers named in it are frequently obliged to perform services before they have the right to demand their fees; and to oblige them, at great expense, to go to distant counties to bring suit against nonresidents

Messrs. C. M. Clement and J. Nevin Hill, for plaintiff in error:

The power of the Legislature extends throughout the State; and it has accordingly power to direct process to be served in any county of the State. The Act in question authorizes the service of a summons upon any person residing out of the county wherein the sheriff or prothonotary may reside. This is process; and when served as required by the Act, after notice, it brings the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court, gives him the right to appear and be heard, and the right of appeal and trial by jury; this, according to all the authorities, is due process of law.

Kennard v. La. 92 U. S. 480 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 478); Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 565). See also Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 616); Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 552).

The Constitution was framed by the people, through a special body selected for the purpose and not by the Legislature. It is not to be construed by the rules of the common law which dealt with an unwritten Constitution, but by such rules as will give it the precise weight and effect which was intended by the framers at the time.

Prigg v. Commonwealth, 16 Peters, 539 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 1060).

From the debates in the Constitutional Convention we learn that the Convention understood, by the term "special law," a law which would operate in certain localities, and not in the whole State, or a law which would affect certain individuals or corporations, and not the whole class to which they might belong. Class legislation is not referred to and not mentioned as an evil to be remedied.

2 Const. Debates, 590, 593, 604, 609, 622; 5 Id. 249.

A private law is one which relates to private matters which do not concern the public at large. The definition of a public law is a law which affects the public, either generally or in some classes.

Bouv. Law Dict. title, Law.

County officers are classified by the Constitution itself. Article XIV, § 1, designates the different classes of county officers, and provides that certain classes shall not be eligible to re-election. Section 4 provides which classes of county officers shall have their offices in their county towns. Section 5 provides that the compensation of county officers shall be regulated by law. Section 7 provides a peculiar mode for the election of certain classes of county officers.

It is impossible for the Legislature to pass laws for the enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution, relative to county officers or any other subject, without making them open to the charge of being in some sense class laws. The powers and duties of county officers as one class cannot be prescribed by a general law, for the reason that their duties are different and is, in effect, to compel them to perform such services without compensation.

On the other hand, in a foot note in Brightly's Purdon, p. 385, it is said: "A summons issued by a justice of the peace is to be served, by the Act of 1810, at least four (should be five) days before the time of hearing. Is it possible that a citizen of Philadelphia may be required to attend before a magistrate in Erie County on four days' notice to answer a claim of $5, or less? This would be a mockery of justice. It cannot be termed 'due process of law'."

If a citizen can be sued for a small sum at such a distance, no matter how good a defense he may have, he must pay the demand or make up his mind to spend perhaps five times the amount to attend the trial. With all this, however, we think the court has nothing to do. Whether the Act in question is a good law or a bad law is a question entirely for the Legislature. The only question before us is the constitutionality of the Act.

Article III, section 7, of the Constitution [of 1874] of Pennsylvania (Purdon, p. 29) declares, among other things, that "The General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law regulating the practice or jurisdiction of or changing the rules of evidence in any judicial proceeding or inquiry before courts, aldermen, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, auditors, masters in chancery or other tribunals; or providing or changing methods for the collection of debts, or the enforcing of judgments, or prescribing the effect of judicial sales of real estate." "Regulating the fees or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables."

Since the adoption of the new Constitution several cases have been decided by the supreme court, in which it has been held that certain Acts of Assembly were in conflict with said article, being special legislation and therefore void. Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125; Scowden's App., 96 Pa. 422.

No case, however, has been cited which decides the question in the present case and I have not been able to find, in any text book or American decision, authority precisely to the point. If the Act in question extended to all officers there would be no difficulty in determining that it is a general and not a special law. The real question in the case is whether the Act is a general or special law; and if it is a special law, is it that kind of a special law that the Legislature is prohibited from enacting by the said section of said article of the Constitution?

The text books abound with definitions of general or public Acts and of special or private Acts. Blackstone says: "A general or public Act is an universal rule that regards the whole community; and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio." "Special or private Acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons and private concerns." 1 Bl. 85.

Kent says: "The most comprehensive if not the most precise definition in the English books is that public Acts relate to the Kingdom at large; and private Acts concern the particular interest or benefit of certain individuals, or of particular classes of men. Generally speaking, statutes are public; and a private statute may rather be considered an exception to a general rule. It operates upon a particular thing or private persons." 1 Kent, 460.

Sedgwick says the best definition is that given by Dwarris: "That public Acts relate to the public at large, and private Acts concern the particular interest or benefit of certain individuals or of particular classes of men." Dwarris, Statutes, 464.

There are many cases in the books upon the distinction between public and private Acts. A note in 9 Bacon's Abridgement, p. 231, also found in 1 Chitty's Blackstone, p. *86, contains a note in the printed report from the committee for the promulgation of the statutes, in which it is said that "Acts are deemed to be public and general Acts, which the judges will take notice of without pleading, viz.: Acts concerning the King, the Queen, and the Prince; those concerning all prelates, nobles and great officers; those concerning the whole spirituality; and those which concern all officers in general, such as all sheriffs, etc. Acts concerning trade in general, or any specific trade; Acts concerning all persons generally, although it be a special or particular thing, such as a statute concerning the assizes, or woods in forests, chases, etc., etc. Private Acts are those which concern only a particular species, thing or person, of which the judges will not take notice without pleading them, viz.: Acts relating to the bishops only; Acts for toleration of dissenters; Acts relating to any particular place, or to divers particular towns, or to one or divers particular counties, or to the colleges only in the universities."

There is no doubt that a statute that extends they naturally and necessarily divide into the classes mentioned in the Constitution itself, and for the same reason their compensation must be fixed by separate or distinct enactment.

A statute which relates to persons or things as a class, is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special, and comes within the constitutional prohibition. The necessity for classification is recognized in the Constitution itself. The true question is, not whether classification is authorized by the terms of the Constitution but whether it is expressly prohibited. In no part of that instrument can such prohibition be found. Classification does not depend upon numbers. The word is used, not to designate numbers but a rank or order of persons or things.

Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 388; Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401.

There can be no proper classification of cities or counties except by population. The moment we resort to geographical distinctions we enter the domain of special legislation, for the reason that such classification operates upon certain cities or counties to the perpetual exclusion of all others.

Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Scowden's Appeal, 96 Pa. 422; Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125; Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377; McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 1 Cent. Rep. 111.

The Act is not special, because it applies alike to all sheriffs and prothonotaries in the State and to all citizens of the State who may become sheriffs and prothonotaries; and anyone may aspire in this Commonwealth to be included in these classes. Nor is it special, as regards others to be affected thereby. It reaches to all who are or may become suitors in our courts.

Mr. Robert L. Cope, for defendants in error:

The Act regulates the practice before a justice of the peace; it changes the methods for the collection of debts, and the enforcing of judgments; it extends the powers and duties of justices of the peace and constables.

It gives an additional and extraordinary remedy to these officers which is not given to other creditors nor even to other county officers. It grants "powers and privileges," in these particular cases, where the courts have jurisdiction to "give the relief asked for," and therefore violates another clause of article III, § 7 of the Constitution.

If an Act is an exception to a general law in force, and limited in its operation to particular cases or for particular purposes, it is undoubtedly a special Act. For a special Act is also defined to be "an exception to a general rule."

The Act is designed only for particular persons, to wit: for sheriffs and prothonotaries whose official terms have expired.

The Act applies to only two of a class of a dozen or more county officers.

to all officers is a public statute; but the question to be determined in the present case is whether a statute that relates, not to all officers but to certain officers only, such as sheriffs and prothonotaries, is a public or private statute. In England it is clear that such a statute is regarded as special. It will afford anyone who has the time, and takes an interest, much pleasure and perhaps instruction, if he will carefully read the reported English cases on the question in hand. The Statute of Westminster which says that no sheriff or other minister of the King shall take any reward to do his office, but be satisfied with what he receives from the King, was held to be a public statute, because it extends to all officers. Holland's Case, 2 Coke, pt. 4, fol. 76, p. 470; 9 Bac. Abr. p. 23.

The Statute of 23 Henry VI, cap. 9, relating to bail in civil causes, is reported in Roberts' Digest, p. 82. This statute was enacted in 1444. Before this the sheriff was not obliged to bail one arrested on mesne process, unless he sued out a writ of mainprise, although he might have taken bail of his own accord. This arbitrary power, which sheriffs possessed, of bailing or refusing to bail produced great extortion and oppression. It took 344 years for the English courts to settle the question as to whether this is a public or private statute. In some of the cases it was held that it only relates to sheriffs and is therefore a private statute, while in others it was held that, although it relates to officers of a certain description, yet all the King's subjects are included in it, for it gives to all of them the right to give bail. The following are a few of the cases in which the statute was held to be private: Benson v. Welby, 2 Saund. 154; Trin. 22, Car. II; 1 Plow. 65; Sid. 24, 439.

The contrary was held in Okry v. Sell, 2 Lev. 103; Pasch. 23 Car. II; 1 Lev. 83; Sid. 23; Samuel v. Evans, 3 Term Rep. 569; Lovell v. Plomer, 15 East, 220; 2 Saund. 155, note.

All the cases are collected in Bacon's Abridgment. The last is the said case of Samuel v. Evans. That was a well considered case and all the authorities on both sides cited by counsel and the court. Ashurst, J., said: "If all the cases on this subject were on one side, however apparently contrary to reason they might be, the court would be bound by them; but if there be several cases, which are not reconcilable with reason on one side, and one sensible case to the contrary, we ought to decide according to the latter. Now there can be no doubt, on the reason of the thing, that the Statute of 23 Hen. VI is a general law; for although it is said to relate to officers of a certain description, yet all the King's subjects are included in it, for it gives to all of them the liberty of being bailed.

Buller, J., in an opinion in the same case, said: "It is astonishing that a doubt could ever have arisen whether the Statute 23 Hen. VI, cap. 9, were a general law or not, for it alludes to all arrests; and every person who may be arrested is within the provisions of it."

In Holland's Case, 2 Coke, pt. 4, fol. 75, p. 470. It was held that "office was a general word or genus; sheriff is a special word or species; and sheriff of Norfolk is individuum;" and the Statute 23 Hen. VI, cap. 9, which extends only to sheriffs, is but a particular and special Act."

It will be observed that all the cases holding the Act to be public put it on the ground that all the King's subjects are included in it. It is therefore clear, I think, that at the common law an Act which relates only to a certain description of officers, such as sheriffs, prothonotaries, etc., is a special Act. That being so, the Act of Assembly in question in this case is clearly a special Act. Indeed, it only relates to certain persons or individuals after they have gone out of office; for it gives them the right to sue for fees "within six years after the expiration of their official terms." It is an Act relating to certain individuals, giving them privileges not given to all the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Then, if it is a special Act, is it such as is prohibited by the Constitution? The Legislature may pass special laws in all cases not mentioned in the article of the Constitution referred to. I am of opinion that it is an Act regulating, in some sense, the jurisdiction of justices of the peace. It extends their jurisdiction throughout the whole State. It changes the rules of evidence. It makes a certificate of a prothonotary, that any bill of fees appears by the record of his office to be correct, prima facie evidence that such fees are lawfully due and correct. It is an Act providing or changing, in one sense, the method for the collection of debts, or the enforcing of judgments. It enables the party to recover a judgment against either the plaintiff or defendant in a suit, after a judgment has already been recovered in the suit in the court of common pleas of the county in which the fees accrued. Two judgments for the same cause of action would be recovered. I have come to the conclusion that the Act conflicts with the Constitution and is therefore void. The judgment of the justice and all proceedings are reversed.

In Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125, the Act was declared to be a special Act; not because it applied only to a particular locality nor because it applied only to a particular individual or individuals, but because it was designed for a particular purpose; thus applying Webster's definition of a special Act, to wit: "An Act designed for a particular purpose."

"A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special and comes within the constitutional prohibition."

Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338.

Here the class is county officers; the sheriff and prothonotary are particular persons of this class. They do not of themselves constitute a class either separately or jointly.

To sustain this Act on the ground of classification the class designated as county officers, by the Constitution, must be subdivided into a class of sheriffs and a class of prothonotaries; then these sub-classes must be again subdivided into a class of ex-sheriffs and a class of ex-prothonotaries; then again into further classes of ex-sheriffs and ex-prothonotaries who have been out of office not more than six years. Then you have the classes to which the Act relates. "This," in the language of Justice Paxson, in Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, "is classification run mad."

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

In February, 1881, suit was commenced by the plaintiff, then late sheriff of Northumberland County, before a justice of the peace in that county, under the provisions of the Act of March 23, 1877 (P. L. 25), to recover from defendants, residents of Northampton County, certain fees earned by him as sheriff in a case in which they were plaintiffs. The summons, directed to a constable of Northumberland, was served in Northampton County by a deputy residing there; but defendants did not appear.

Judgment having been rendered in favor of plaintiff, the record of the justice was removed by certiorari into the court of common pleas, and exceptions were filed thereto as follows:

1. That the Act of Assembly, under which the suit was brought, is unconstitutional and void.

2. That the justice had no jurisdiction of the defendants, the summons not having been served within his jurisdiction.

Both exceptions having been sustained by the court, the judgment of the justice and all proceedings before him were reversed and set aside. The record was then brought here for review. The vital question here, as there, is whether the Act under which the suit was brought is constitutional.

The first section declares: "It shall be lawful for any prothonotary or prothonotaries," sheriff or sheriffs of the several counties of this Commonwealth, within six years after the expiration of their official terms, to sue any person or persons residing out of the county wherein such prothonotary or sheriff shall reside, for the recovery of any fee or fees in an action of debt or assumpsit for official service performed or hereafter to be performed for such person or persons during such official term, before any justice of the peace within the county wherein such officer shall reside; that the writ of summons, in any such case, shall be directed to a constable in the county wherein the suit is instituted, which said constable is hereby authorized, by writing indorsed on such writ of summons, to depute any other constable in any other county in the State of Pennsylvania, in which the defendant or defendants shall reside, to execute said writ."

The second section declares that such service of the writ shall have the same force and effect as if served by a constable of the county wherein such action is commenced; and upon return of service the justice shall proceed to trial and judgment, upon which there shall be no stay of execution, as if such writ had been duly served in the same county.

The third section authorizes the officers named to sue for and recover fees from the plaintiff, before judgment; and from either plaintiff or defendant after judgment, in any suit in which such fees shall have been earned.

The fourth section provides for execution in any county of the Commonwealth.

The fifth section declares: "In all suits hereafter to be brought in any county by such officer or officers for the recovery of fees, a certificate of the prothonotary of the county wherein such suit is instituted, under his hand and seal of office, that any bill of fees appears by the record of his office to be correct, shall be prima facie evidence that such fees are lawfully due and correct."

The sixth and last section requires at least ten days' notice to the party or attorney of record before bringing suit under the Act.

Prior to the adoption of our present Constitution, pernicious class legislation similar to that contained in the Act above summarized was of such frequent occurrence that to remedy the evil it was ordained in section 7, article 3 of the Constitution, among other things, that the "General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law * * * regulating the practice or jurisdiction of, or changing the rules of evidence in any judicial proceeding or inquiry before courts, aldermen, justices of the peace, sheriffs, commissioners, arbitrators, auditors, masters in chancery or other tribunals, or providing or changing methods for the collection of debts or the enforcing of judgments, or prescribing the effect of judicial sales of real estate; regulating the fees or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables; * * * nor shall any law be passed granting powers or privileges in any case where the granting of such powers and privileges shall have been provided for by general law, nor where the courts have jurisdiction to grant the same or give the relief asked for."

The Act in question is so manifestly in conflict with both the letter and the spirit of these constitutional provisions that a discussion of the subject beyond what may be found in the opinion of the learned president of the common pleas is uncalled for. He has pointed out very clearly wherein the Act is manifestly unconstitutional.

It is a special Act, in that it is designed for a particular purpose and is applicable only to particular persons and to them only for a limited period. In the special and restricted range of its operation it undertakes, among other things, to regulate the practice before justices of the peace; it changes the method of collecting certain specified debts due and owing to particular persons during a certain period only; it extends the powers and duties of justices of the peace and constables; it changes the rules of evidence in the particular cases to which alone it applies. In these and other particulars it is clearly in conflict with the constitutional provisions above quoted.

Without further comment, we are fully satisfied with the conclusion reached by the court below.

The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, reversing the judgment of the Justice and all proceedings thereunder, is affirmed.

Watkin JAMES, Plff. in Err.,
v.

John CROWNOVER.

An instrument in the form of a promissory note with the addition of the words: "and waiving the benefit of all laws exempting property from levy and sale by execution, and confessing judgment for the said amount" is sufficient, when filed with the proper averment of non-payment and an express confession signed by an attorney, to authorize the entry of judgment by the prothonotary; and a judgment so entered should not be stricken off by the court.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Juniata County to review a judgment discharging a rule to show cause why a judgment entered upon a note signed by the plaintiff in error should not be stricken off. Affirmed.

On January 7, 1886, the defendant in error, plaintiff below, filed of record the following instrument in writing:

"Mifflintown, Pa., Oct. 1, 1885.

On January 1, 1886, after date, I promise to pay to the order of John Crownover, at the banking house of Parker & Co., five hundred and forty-five dollars, without defalcation, value recd., and waiving the benefit of all laws exempting property from levy and sale by execution, and confess judgment for the said amount of five hundred and forty-five dollars.

Watkin James."

With this was filed an averment that the whole sum of $545, with interest from January 1, 1886, was due, and an express confession of judgment signed by the attorneys for the plaintiff as attorneys for the defendant, in the following words:

"By virtue of above general confession of judgment and warrant thereto, we hereby appear for Watkin James, to the above stated suit, and confess judgment against him and in favor of the above plaintiff for the sum of five hundred and forty-five dollars, with costs, release of errors, etc., waiving the benefit of all laws exempting property from levy and sale by execution, with interest from January 1, 1886.

D. D. Stone and J. A. McKee,
Attorneys for defendant."

Filed January 7, 1886.

PA.

Thereupon the prothonotary entered judgment. The court subsequently discharged a rule taken by James, to show cause why the judgment should not be stricken off, and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. Alfred Ashton and Alfred J. Patterson, for plaintiff in error:

The words used in the note gave no power to anyone except the prothonotary to appear for plaintiff in error.

A warrant to confess judgment contains not only a grant of the authority, expressed clearly and intelligibly, but a designation by name or description of the person who is to execute it.

Rabe v. Heslip, 4 Pa. 189; Act, Feb. 24, 1806, 1 Bright. Purd. p. 825; Person v. Weston, 1 Kulp, 337.

The warrant to confess must be express.

Rabe v. Heslip, supra; Lytle v. Colts, 27 Pa. 193.

A warrant of attorney is an instrument in writing or a demand to one or more attorneys therein named, authorizing them, generally, to appear in any court or in some specified court, on behalf of the person giving it, and to confess judgment in favor of some particular person therein named, in an action of debt.

2 Bouv. Law. Dic. 650.

The judgment is irregular because no warrant of attorney was filed when judgment was entered.

Judgment cannot be entered on warrant of attorney, before the warrant is actually filed in the prothonotary's office.

Chambers v. Denie, 2 Pa. 421; Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 289.

On diminution of record suggested, the court will issue a certiorari to bring up the warrant.

Cro. Jac. 277; 3 Bac. Abr. 345, title, Error; 1 Com. Dig. 752, title, Attorney, B. 8.

Where no bond can be produced, or where no warrant of attorney exists, or none authorizing such judgment, the court cannot amend; and a judgment entered without authority ought to be stricken off.

Adams v. Bush, 5 Watts, 291.

Such a judgment should be stricken from the record at once, without regard to the question of indebtedness.

1 Troubat & H. 4th ed. (1867) p. 399; Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 289.

The courts have authority to vacate or modify judgments entered by warrant of attorney, either for cause appearing on the record or for such as may be established by depositions.

Hutchinson v. Ledlie, 36 Pa. 112; Cochran v. Eldridge, 49 Pa. 365.

When there is no suit brought, and the plaintiff himself employs an attorney to appear for the defendant, under a warrant which is in the plaintiff's possession, in such a case, although the appearance is in form an appearance by the defendant, it is in fact an appearance procured by the plaintiff himself for his own advantage.

In a case of that kind, if the plaintiff causes a judgment to be entered against the defendant without a warrant to authorize it, the judgment should be stricken off.

Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 289; Campbell v. Kent, 3 Pen. & W. 75.

The warrant of attorney must be filed without oyer demanded.

Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 289.

Messrs. D. D. Stone and John A. McKee, for defendant in error:

Setting aside a judgment is a matter of sound discretion on the facts, and the refusal is not the subject of writ of error.

Sweeney v. Kitchen, 80 Pa. 160.

The prothonotary had the right to enter judgment on this note under section 28 of the Act of February 24, 1806.

Helcete v. Rapp, 7 Serg. & R. 306; Ely v. Karmany, 23 Pa. 314.

Per Curiam:

There was no error in the refusal of the court to strike this judgment from the record. The note upon which it was entered contains an express confession of judgment. Not only did attorneys for the maker of the note appear and confess judgment against him, but the prothonotary also entered judgment on the note against him.

The record showed no such defect or error as to require the court to strike off the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

1. To authorize judgment for want of an affidavit of defense against a married woman for work or labor done or money expended in relation to her real estate, the copy of book entries filed must contain or be accompanied by an averment that the debt was contracted for an act done that was necessary for the use, enjoyment or preservation of the wife's property.
2. Items of cash paid for the repair, or commissions charged for the sale of real estate, are not proper subjects of book account, and are not within the affidavit of defense law.
3. The statute limiting the time within which a writ of error may be sued out, does not apply to a married woman, plaintiff in error.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Cumberland County, to review a judgment for the plaintiffs for want of an affidavit of defense in an action of assumpsit. Reversed.

Motion to quash the writ of error. Denied.

This was a suit by Early & Kinzer, real estate agents, against James V. Fenn and Rebecca J. his wife. The summons was returnable May 7, 1883. The plaintiffs, on April 27, filed a statement in which they alleged their demand against the said defendants to be founded upon "a certain book account for work and labor done, services rendered and moneys paid, laid out and expended by said plaintiffs for the use of said defendant Rebecca J. Fenn, wife of said James V. Fenn, as per copy of said book account hereto attached, verified by the oath of said E. E. Kinzer, on behalf of said plaintiffs and made part hereof;" and upon "a claim for work and labor done for and in relation to the sale of the real estate of said Rebecca J. Fenn, of which she was the owner at the time when said work and labor was done, as per said copy of book account, and at her instance and request."

The copy of the book account mentioned in the plaintiff's statement, and filed the same day, was as follows:

"Mrs. R. J. Fenn

	$315 65

To this was attached the affidavit of one of the plaintiffs that the account was copied from their books of original entry.

On May 26, 1883, the plaintiffs took judgment for want of an affidavit of defense for the balance shown by the account, with interest.

At a later hour in the same day an affidavit of defense by the defendant James V. Fenn was filed, alleging in substance: that the said Rebecca J. Fenn was, at the time of making the alleged contracts and at the filing of the affidavit, a feme covert; and that the alleged services were not necessities nor for the improvement of her real estate; but that, on the contrary, the transaction was to her disadvantage and resulted in a loss of $2,000 for which the plaintiffs were answerable.

Had an affidavit of defense been necessary, it should have been filed May 25.

On May 29, by petition setting forth their defense and that the failure to file the affidavit in time was due to a mistake in dates, the defendants obtained a rule to show cause why the judgment should not be stricken off or opened. This rule was afterward discharged without notice to the defendants. Execution returnable in April, 1884, called their attention to the fact, and they thereupon obtained a similar rule.

On January 5, 1886, the court below, Barnett, P. J specially presiding, discharged the second rule; and on April 1, 1886, the defendants took this writ and assigned as error inter alia the action of the court below in holding the copy filed sufficient to sustain a judgment for want of an affidavit of defense; in entering judgment; in not striking off the judgment; and in discharging the defendant's rules.

Messrs. S. Hepburn, Jr., E. W. Biddle and Fleming & McCarrell, for plaintiffs in error:

Not an item in the copy filed is a proper subject for book entry, or susceptible of proof by books of original entry. All, except the charge for commission, are cash payments; and that cash payments cannot be proved by books of original entry is too well settled to admit of discussion.

The only other item in this account is the 4 per cent commission, on the sale of the Walnut Street house. The amount of these commissions depended upon the contract between the parties, and could not be proven by entries which one party chose to make in their books. There is no allegation or affidavit in the statement of claim filed, that the defendants or either of them ever agreed to pay these commissions.

An item of commission for collecting a sum of money is not a proper subject for a book charge.

Hale's Errs. v. Ard's Errs. 48 Pa. 22.

Commissions of a broker for sale of real estate, are not proper subjects of a book charge.

Great v. Noll, 1 W. N. C. 26; McStay v. Dugan, 2 W. N. C. 226; Sylvester v. Thompson, 11 W. N. C. 203.

A stock broker's books, charging commissions, etc., are not books of original entry within the meaning of the affidavit of defense law; and the objection thereto is not waived by filing an affidavit of defense.

Hudley v. Miller, 12 W. N. C. 461.

Had this case been on trial these books could not have been received in evidence to prove the plaintiff's claim. They would have been compelled to offer other evidence or suffer a compulsory nonsuit.

The declaration does not allege that plaintiff's claim is for necessities furnished the wife and contracted for by her. Neither does it allege that the claim against her is for the necessary improvement of her real estate. The sale of her real estate at her instance and request is not averred to have been for her advantage; while the affidavit of defense distinctly alleges that the sale was disadvantageous and resulted in serious loss to the wife.

The eighth section of the Act of April 11, 1848 (Purd. 1151), contains this important proviso, viz.: "Provided: That judgment shall not be rendered against the wife in such joint action, unless it shall have been proved that the debt sued for in such action was conducted by the wife and incurred for articles necessary for the support of the family of the said husband and wife."

The book of original entries was not proof of the plaintiff's claim; and the only affidavit filed was to the effect that the account was a correct copy of the books of original entry. Surely this was not the proof required by the statute to sustain a judgment against a married woman.

No definition of family necessities can be given, but must be left to the jury in each case as it arises.

Parke v. Kleber, 25 Pa. 251.

Judgment cannot be taken against a married woman for want of an affidavit of defense.

Scott v. Wilmer, 1 W. N. C. 41; Eisenbery v. Negus, 2 W. N. C. 445; Cooper v. Wallace, 7 W. N. C. 468.

In Debraham v. Walker, 3 W. N. C. 26, which was an action of assumpsit against husband and wife on a book account against the wife, the court, in discharging the rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, says: "Some further proof is necessary, besides the book of original entries."

In Lippincott v. Hopkins, 57 Pa. 328, Judge Brewster designates, inter alia, the cases under which a married woman is liable to suit upon her separate contract as follows: "Where the debt is contracted by the wife for the improvement of her separate estate, where the repair is necessary to preserve her property from dilapidation and to render it tenantable."

The liability depends upon the necessity of the thing contracted for by the wife to preserve or improve her separate estate. The necessity for this purpose is the essential fact, without which no liability attaches to the wife. The declaration in the present case does not aver dilapidation or any necessity for the sale of the wife's real estate, and is therefore incurably defective.

In the case of Lippincott v. Leeds, 77 Pa. 422, the declaration expressly averred that the material furnished for the repairing of the wife's property was necessary for the preservation and enjoyment of said houses.

The judgment must be stricken off because the declaration does not contain the necessary averments and proof to sustain it.

The learned judge erred in concluding that there was nothing in the merits of the case to urge the opening of this judgment.

Messrs. Francis Jordan and James M. Weakley, for defendants in error:

The defendants in error move to quash the writ in this case because not sued out within two years from the entry of the judgment, as required by the first section of Act of April 1, 1874, P. L. 1874, 50; Purd. p. 702, § 2.

There were intermediate proceedings, but they cannot legally affect this motion.

Application was made, May 29, 1883, by petition, to open the judgment; and a rule was granted as prayed. A full answer to the rule was filed, and the case in due course was put on the argument list. The affidavit of defense filed after the entry of judgment was of no legal consequence. Under the well known rules and practice in such cases the petition and affidavit to open had become functus officio, upon the granting of the rule; and being unsupported by any evidence the court could properly do nothing else than discharge when the matter came up for hearing. All things are presumed to be properly done in courts of justice; and even if the counsel of the defendant below was not present it could make no difference, nor could the other party be thereby prejudiced.

Association v. McBride, 4 W. N. C. 477; Barter v. Szeley, 10 W. N. C. 208.

The rule was discharged, August 22, 1883, and the plaintiffs in error had then, if never before, the right to their writ of error; and they had the two years fixed by statute in which to take it; yet it was not applied for or taken until April 1, 1886.

At the utmost, the application of the defendants below was an appeal to the equitable discretion of the court to open the judgment; and, as such, is not reviewable.

Riegel v. Wilson, 60 Pa. 388; Wernet's App. 91 Pa. 319; Hill v. Irwin, 82 Pa. 814; and Commonwealth v. Howard, 11 W. N. C. 81 and 82. And see also 17 W. N. C. 422; 100 Pa. 291; Grim's App. 105 Pa. 375-385.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

Inasmuch as the plaintiff in error is a feme covert, the statute limiting the time within which a writ of error may be sued out does not apply to her. The motion to quash the writ is therefore denied.

The main contention is whether the statement filed is sufficient to support the judgment.

The claim is to recover a judgment in personam against the husband and wife for work and labor done and money expended, in relation to the sale of the real estate of the wife, at her instance and request.

The proviso to the Act of April 11, 1848, gives no express authority to a married woman to bind her separate estate by contract for the improvement or repair of her real estate. This power is only constructively within the Act. Heugh v. Jones, 32 Pa. 432; Murray v. Keyes, 35 Pa. 884; Shannon v. Shultz, 87 Pa. 481.

To sustain a common-law action against a husband and wife with a view of charging the separate estate of the wife, facts must be averred in the narr. and proved on the trial, sufficient to bring the case within the Act. It is not sufficient that a cause of action against the wife be proved, it must also be set forth in the declaration. Murray v. Keyes, supra; Parks v. Kleeber, 37 Pa. 251.

When the attempt is to charge the real estate of a married woman by a mechanics' lien the same rule applies. Shannon v. Shultz, supra; Kuhns v. Turney, 87 Pa. 497; Loomis v. Fry, 91 Pa. 896.

A judgment against a married woman which does not affirmatively show her liability on a contract within the statute is void; and a sheriff's sale of her property on execution issued thereon will confer no title to the purchaser. Hecker v. Haak, 88 Pa. 238; Hugus v. Dithridge Glass Co. 96 Pa. 160.

Applying these rules of law to the record in this case we find it clearly defective. It contains no averment that the debt was contracted for any act done, that was necessary for the use, enjoyment or preservation of her property, or that its condition or value was such as to make a sale thereof necessary, or even advisable for her advantage or profit. It is not sufficient to allege it was done for her use and at her instance and request. In some suitable language the necessity therefore must also be averred in the statement or narr. No such language is contained in this statement.

We also think the items contained in the copy of the alleged book account filed are not within the meaning of the rule requiring an affidavit of defense to be put in. The principal item is for commission on sale of a house. This is not a proper subject of a book charge to be proved by the production of the book as one of original entry. Hale's Exrs. v. Ard's Exrs. 48 Pa. 22.

Other items are manifestly for money paid. The fact that the statement of the account is copied from books which the plaintiff below avers to be his books of original entries does not cure the defect. If the entries had no legal standing there to charge the defendant, a copy thereof cannot give to them additional force.

If they were not originally proper subjects of book account they have not become so since, and therefore are not within the rule requiring an affidavit of defense when a copy of the book entries is filed.

Judgment reversed and a procedendo awarded.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review a judgment for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Reversed.

This was an action of assumpsit by James Diefenderfer and his wife, to the use of the said wife, brought to recover arrears of interest due the plaintiff Sarah on her dower on the land of her late husband, Jacob J. Snyder, deceased.

At the trial before Meyers, P. J., specially presiding, the following facts appeared:

Jacob J. Snyder died on October 3, 1873, intestate, leaving to survive him his widow (now married to James Diefenderfer), and five minor children, and seised of two tracts of land situated in Lynn Township, Lehigh County, one containing about 76 acres, and the other about 8 acres.

On October 27, 1873, Henry J. Snyder, the guardian of three of these minor children, presented his petition in the orphans' court instituting proceedings in partition to divide this real estate.

The widow had notice of a rule to show cause why the land should not be sold.

An inquest was awarded which resulted in the sale of the real estate under these proceedings in partition, after refusal of all the heirs to accept. The order of sale was issued to Jacob Zimmerman, who had been appointed administrator of the estate.

The terms of the sale as fixed by the court were 10 per centum cash on the day of sale, one half of the purchase money on the first of April, 1874, and the balance thereof on the first Monday of October, 1874, with interest from the first of April, 1874.

Zimmerman made return to the court, that he sold tract No. 1, the seventy-six acres, to Daniel F. Snyder for $2,750; and tract No. 2 to the same person for $150, which sale was confirmed by the court on April 24, 1874.

Snyder, before receiving his deed from the administrator, entered into written articles of agreement with Jacob Eschleman, the defendant, dated March 22, 1875, for the sale of these two tracts of land. The consideration to be paid as stated in those articles of agreement, was as follows: "The sum of $1,652 on the delivery of these presents, and the balance (less the dower which will remain on the said premises to the widow of J. J. Snyder, deceased, but the interest to said widow during her life), on the first of April next. Subject, also, to the dower of Jacob Snyder on said premises."

The defendant introduced under objection the following testimony of one Weiss in relation to this agreement:

Q. Did Eschleman and Snyder come to your office together at any time after the agreement was made?

A. When the deed was delivered.

Q. What was said about the dower?

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant and a declaration between third parties; objection overruled and bill sealed for plaintiffs. Assignment of error.

A. The deed was made by some one from Zimmerman to Snyder; by whom I do not know; I wrote the deed from Snyder to Eschleman and I wrote it on the same form. I read the deed over to the parties as a matter of course. I was under the impression myself that Snyder got a free deed; so I had learned; and so he had to give a free deed, and so I wrote it.

Q. You inserted in the agreement that it was to be subject to a certain dower?

A. No, sir; I must acknowledge that it was put in at the instance of myself, because I was under the impression that the dower would remain. Afterwards I learned that the dower might be taken off.

Objected to as being in contradiction of a written paper and as a matter not transpiring in the presence of the plaintiffs, and also as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled; and bill sealed for plaintiffs. Assignment of error.

Jacob Zimmerman, the administrator, conveyed these two tracts of land to Daniel F. Snyder by deed dated November 20, 1875; and Daniel

F. Snyder conveyed the same land, in pursuance of the agreement, to Jacob Eschleman by deed dated December 17, 1875. No mention of the widow's dower was made in either of those deeds.

Jacob Eschleman afterwards reconveyed to Daniel F. Snyder seven acres and twenty-six perches of this same land, and the balance he kept and held at the time this action was brought.

Jacob Zimmerman, the administrator, charged himself in his account with the proceeds of this real estate, and used some of it, in connection with the proceeds of the personal estate, for the payment of debts and expenses; so that the whole balance for distribution, as found by the auditor on the administrator's account, was $1,169.87.

The widow never appeared before the auditor, and never released this dower or authorized anyone else to release it from the land. The administrator and Daniel F. Snyder, with their counsel, appeared before the auditor; and the auditor reported as a fact that "It was also agreed that the balance in hand, or assets arising from the sale of the real estate, is to be considered as real estate for the purposes of distribution, and that the widow is entitled to one third of the net balance, the interest whereof is to be paid to her during the period of her natural life annually; and that the said one third so distributed shall be invested on real estate security during said term." And he reported a distribution, inter alia, to "Sarah Ann Snyder (widow), $389.79." His report was filed and confirmed by the court, December 28, 1875.

This money was never invested for the widow; and all she ever received on her interest was on December 8, 1876, in goods out of the administrator's store for $33.78; and from his son in cash, in 1877, $23.38.

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

"Here are two innocent persons. The law says the court should have made a decree in a certain way; that this interest of the widow, constituting her dower, shall remain in the hands of the purchaser; but the court made a different order, and it may have made an order for reasons which we do not know. Zimmerman the administrator is dead and Snyder is dead, and they are not here to explain; and it is possible that it may have been understood between them that this dower was not to remain a charge on this land.

The deed which Snyder had from the administrator showed that it was a free deed and not subject to this dower. This lady also had constructive notice, and she made no objection. We would be glad if we could discover that she was the least culpable, so far as laches are concerned; but we cannot do so, as we understand the law. We think she is most to blame in this matter, as between the two innocent parties; and we therefore hold that the defendant in this suit is not liable, and direct that under the evidence you enter a verdict in favor of the defendant."

The jury found for the defendant in accordance with the direction of the court. Whereupon, the plaintiffs took this writ assigning as error the admission of the testimony of Weiss and the portions of the charge above quoted.

Mr. James S. Biery, for plaintiffs in error:

There was neither fraud, accident nor mistake alleged in the execution of the written agreement between Daniel F. Snyder and Jacob Eschleman, the defendant, for the sale of the land on which this dower remains.

Where parties, without any fraud or mistake, have deliberately put their engagements in writing, the law declares the writing to be not only the best, but the only evidence of their agreement.

Martin v. Berens, 67 Pa. 403; Thorne v. Wurfflein, 100 Pa. 519.

Where there is no allegation that a limitation to an agreement was left out by fraud, accident or mistake, it cannot afterwards be interpolated by evidence on the trial of a case involving the agreement.

Heebner v. Worrall, 38 Pa. 373.

The real estate was sold under proceedings in partition; and our Act of March 29, 1832, Purd. Dig. §§ 41, 542, pl. 172, provides that in such case the widow "shall not be entitled to payment of the sum at which her purport or share of the estate shall be valued; but the same, together with interest thereof, shall be and remain charged upon the premises," etc.

Section 42 provides that where land is sold "under proceedings in partition, such real estate shall not be liable, in the hands of the purchaser, to the debts of the decedent," etc. And section 43 of the same Act directs, that "Where a decree for the sale of real estate shall be made by the orphans' court, in the event provided for in the preceding section, the court shall direct that the share of the widow, if there be one, of the purchase money, shall remain in the hands of the purchaser, during the natural life of the widow; and the interest thereof shall be annually and regularly paid to her by the purchaser, his heirs and assigns, holding the premises," etc.

What is the nature of a widow's statutory dower under our statutes? This court has said: "What her estate really is, is expressed in the Intestate Act of April 8, 1833, § 1. 'One third part of the real estate for the term of her life,' and the form in which the law assigns it leaves its character unchanged."

Schall's App. 40 Pa. 177.

Like dower at common law, it is a defined interest in her husband's lands, arising at his death, and is a freehold estate.

Bachman v. Chrisman, 23 Pa. 163.

It is an interest arising out of the land, in all respects of the nature of a rent charge, and subject to sale on execution.

Shaupe v. Shaupe, 12 Serg. & R. 12; Thomas v. Simpson, 8 Pa. 70.

It is an indefeasible charge for the widow and the heirs, and legal representatives after her death.

Vandever v. Baker, 13 Pa. 126; Meizer v. Menor, 8 Watts, 296.

That the widow's interest is real estate is well settled by repeated decisions. Kurtz's App. 26 Pa. 466.

That it is real estate is clear from considering that the Intestate Act gives her, where there are children, one third of her deceased husband's lands during her life.

Miller v. Leidig, 3 Watts & S. 458.

To call it a lien by way of expressing another additional security for the widow's rights is not to deny its true character as an estate.

Ziegler's App. 35 Pa. 189.

It is an estate that is given by the intestate laws; and the partition laws do not change it. But whatever difficulty there may be in defining the estate, there is no difficulty in understanding what it really and practically is. Where the widow's share is laid off by metes and bounds, she has a life estate in the portion assigned to her as land, which carries with it as a necessary incident the right to receive the rents and profits; but where the estate is accepted at the appraisement or sold, she has a life estate, not in any specific portion of the land, but in an equivalent share of the rents and profits of the whole estate, measured by the interest on her share of its value as ascertained by appraisement or sale. In whichever form, therefore, the assignment of her share is made, she has an estate in the land of which her husband died seised; and by force of statute it vests in her eo instanti the husband dies.

Gourley v. Kinky, 66 Pa. 274.

And this court has also said: "We have examined the old Acts of Assembly, April 19, 1794, § 22; April 7, 1807, § 6; and April 14, 1828, § 5, relative to the assignment of the widow's share in partition, and compared them with the Orphans' Court Act of March 29, 1832, §§ 41-43, and are satisfied that none of them change the character of her estate given by the Intestate Acts in lieu of dower, but only prescribe the form of assigning it."

Schall's App. 40 Pa. 177.

In addition, the Act of Assembly gives her the remedy of distress for the collection of her interest, which places her in the attitude of a landlord possessed of an estate. According to these authorities, the widow has not only a lien on the land but an interest or estate in the land.

The widow is not required, by our Acts of Assembly or by the decisions of the courts, to do anything in order to secure her statutory dower. The statute creates her estate and preserves it for her and the heirs until she dies, or until by some act of hers she relinquishes her rights.

In passing upon this very question, under the Act of April 19, 1794, this court has said: "It would not be in the power of the court to divest the lien of the widow and heirs in the teeth of an Act so express as the present; and it seems to me it is not using them fairly in supposing they had any such intention."

Medlar v. Aulenbach, 2 Pen. & W. 355.

In Hise v. Geiger, 7 Watts & S. 273, bonds and a mortgage were given by the purchaser to secure the interest of the widow and heirs, respectively, the principal of which was paid at the widow's death to the administrator, who entered satisfaction upon the mortgage and canceled the bonds. The court below held that this discharged the share of the widow and heirs and directed a verdict in favor of the defendant. This court reversed the court below and said, p. 275: "The lien remains, notwithstanding the recognition and mortgage executed by the purchaser, which, as is held in the case cited (2 Pen. & W. 355), are additional, collateral and cumulative remedies or securities for the debt." And the payment to the administrator was held not to affect the lien.

In Fisher v. Kcan, 1 Watts, 261, this court said: "The direction that it should be secured by remaining a lien on the land amounted to nothing; the law had placed it there and made it a lien beyond the control of courts and juries until the widow died or released it."

The case at bar is very similar to that of Kline v. Bowman, 19 Pa. 25. In that case the court also failed to direct in the order of sale that the widow's share should remain in the land; but in the deed the conveyance was made subject to the widow's dower; while in the case at bar the dower was mentioned and reserved in the articles of agreement between Daniel F. Snyder and Jacob Eschleman, the defendant, and the conveyance was thereby agreed to be made subject to the dower.

Judge Lewis, in delivering the opinion, in Kline v. Bowman, said at page 33: "We are of opinion, for the reasons stated in the opinion of the court below, that the lien, by which the interest on one third of the purchase money was secured for the benefit of the widow for life, the principal to be paid to the heirs at her death, continued a charge upon the land, and was not divested by the sheriff's sale."

Clearly, then, the omission of the court to direct that the widow's share should remain a charge on the land, could not divest her of her statutory interest or estate in the land, which vested in her eo instanti her husband's decease.

An action of assumpsit may be maintained against a person taking land charged with the payment of money, as a means of enforcing payment out of the land. This arises out of privity of estate in the assignee, whose land is thus charged as a means of subjecting it to execution by a judgment de terris.

De Haven v. Bartholomew, 57 Pa. 126.

See also, Hise v. Geiger, 7 Watts & S. 275.

A widow has divers cumulative remedies for the collection of arrears due her on the valuation of her estate. The whole of the land is charged. Assumpsit or debt may be maintained by her, or after her death by the parties entitled to unpaid arrears and the principal against the alienee of the person who accepted the land, and the judgment will be entered de terris.

Alleman's App. 42 Legal Int. 70.

Mr. Evan Holben, for defendant in error:

The Act of April 8, 1833, does not provide how the money shall be secured. The plaintiff's interest is not an estate in the land, that cannot be divested by proceedings in partition. It is an annuity in the nature of a rent charge.

Power v. Power, 7 Watts, 212.

She cannot enjoy the land, except where her purport is laid off by metes and bounds under proceedings in partition.

The estate in the land may be divested in the manner prescribed in the Act; as, upon petition of the widow or one or more of the children.

Thomas v. Simpson, 8 Pa. 70.

By Act of March 29, 1832, it is provided, inter alia, that "The court may, on due proof of notice to all persons interested, make a decree authorizing and requiring the executor or administrator, as the case may be, to expose such real estate to public sale at such time and place, and on such terms as the court may decree."

Under this Act the court decreed that the terms should be cash. The authority of the PA.

court to do this cannot be controverted. These terms of sale ought to have been objected to by the widow if they were not satisfactory to her. If the decree was not strictly in accordance with the spirit of the Act, she ought not to have slept on her rights. A widow may waive her right to dower by her silence.

Where one of two parties who are equally innocent of actual fraud must lose, the one whose misplaced confidence in an agent or attorney has been the cause of the loss shall not throw it on the other.

Pa. R. R. Co's App. 86 Pa. 80.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

A tenant in dower at common law has an estate and not a mere lien. Zeigler's App. 35 Pa. 178.

So under our intestate laws a widow's statutory dower is an interest in the land, not merely a lien.

Miller v. Leidig, 8 Watts & S. 458; Backman v. Chrisman, 23 Pa. 162; Schall's App. 40 Pa. 170; Gourley v. Kinley, 66 Pa. 270.

Section 41 of the Act of March 29, 1832, declares if the widow of the decedent be living at the time of the partition of his real estate, she shall not be entitled to payment of the sum at which her purport or share of the estate shall be valued; but the same, together with interest thereof, shall be and remain charged on the premises; and the legal interest thereof shall be annually and regularly paid by the persons to whom such real estate shall be adjudged, their heirs and assigns.

The remedies of the widow for the collection of her dower are cumulative. Medlar v. Aulenbach, 2 Pen. & W. 359.

She may collect by distraining or proceed on the recognizance, or other obligation given by the person to whom it was allotted, or bring assumpsit against his assignee. Pidcock v. Bye, 3 Rawle, 183; DeHaven v. Bartholomew, 57 Pa. 126.

Each of the several Acts of 1794, 1807, 1828 and 1832 relates to the assignment of the widow's share in partition. No one of them however changes the estate given to her by the intestate laws in lieu of dower, but only prescribes the form of assigning it. Schall's App. supra.

The legislative command, that the money for her share in the land shall remain charged thereon, withholds from the orphans' court in awarding partition all power to decree otherwise, unless her consent be procured in such manner as to pass her estate in the land. Fisher v. Kean, 1 Watts, 259.

No such consent was given in this case.

The assignee is in no better position than the original purchaser. The Act of 1832, cited, expressly extends the same liability to him. He was bound to take notice of the decree of partition which is in the line of his title. Here however the defendant had actual notice of the widow's estate in the land, and of her claim to the annual interest thereon.

Under proceedings in partition by the heirs of J. J. Snyder the intestate, the real estate was sold to one Daniel F. Snyder, and confirmed by the court. Before a deed therefor was delivered to him he entered into a written agreement under seal with the defendant for a sale of the land to the latter in consideration of $3,875, agreed to be paid therefor, to wit: $1,652 on the delivery of "these presents" and the balance on the first day of April then next, "less the dower which will remain on the said premises, to the widow of J. J. Snyder deceased, but the interest to said widow during her life;" subject also to the dower of Jacob Snyder on said premises."

When Daniel afterwards executed a deed to the defendant, it does not appear that a reference was therein made to the dower of the plaintiff. Whether that may affect the vendor on the covenants in his deed is a question not now before us. Certain it is that that does not relieve the defendant from the express notice he had received of the estate and claim of the defendant.

We discover nothing in the evidence to estop the plaintiff from maintaining this action. The fact that she had notice of the rule to show cause why the property should not be sold works no estoppel against her. The result of that sale would determine the annual sum which she would be entitled to receive; but it could not affect the character of her estate nor deprive her of all appropriate remedies for the enforcement of her rights.

The omission in the deed, from the administrator to Daniel F. Snyder, to refer to the plaintiff's right of dower, and the fact that Daniel paid the whole purchase money to the administrator, and the additional one that when the defendant accepted the deed he understood, from his vendor or the scrivener who drew it, that the land was clear from incumbrance, are all irrelevant, and the evidence thereof was improperly admitted. The plaintiff was not a party to nor present at any of those transactions. The acts and declarations of other persons could not impair her estate in the land nor destroy her remedies for the collection of the sum given her by law.

The learned judge, therefore, erred in taking the case from the jury and in instructing them to find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

LANCASHIRE INSURANCE COMPANY,

Plff. in Err.,
v.

Thomas J. NILL and E. J. Nill, His Wife, in Right of the Wife.

1. In an action of debt upon a policy of fire insurance, where the defendant filed a plea of non est factum, the plaintiff must offer evidence of the execution of the policy sued upon. Evidence that it was countersigned by parties representing themselves to be agents and in possession of the policy is not sufficient.
2. Where a party holds a policy of insurance in one company at the time of loss, no liability can attach against another company on a policy issued before the fire and retained by the agent until after the loss, to be substituted for the first policy, but of which the assured had no knowledge, and this, although the assured accepted the substituted policy after the loss and gave up the other one for cancellation.

3. An attempt by the agent to shift the responsibility from the company upon which it had fallen to the other, which, at the time of the fire, had assumed no responsibility, is a fraud on the latter company.
4. The unearned premium of the canceled policy, not being returnable until after the loss, could not be applied to the other policy before the loss; and it was error to allow the jury to infer that it was.
5. Held, under the facts of this case, that the agent who issued this policy was not the agent of the assured.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Franklin County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, in an action of debt on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts were substantially these:

In 1881 and prior thereto, Mrs. Nill owned a life estate in a woolen mill, situated near Chambersburg, Pa. About May 1, 1881 she authorized her husband Thomas J. Nill to effect an insurance on this mill, to the amount of $1,500, and he procured a policy for that amount, for one year, from the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, through Kauffman & Brown, its agents at Harrisburg. When this policy expired, May 1, 1882, she procured one for a like amount from the Imperial & Northern Insurance Company, from Kauffman & Brown, they being also that company's agents. About June 1, Mrs. Nill was advised by the company's agents that they were ordered to cancel the Imperial and Northern policy, and they sent her as a proposed substitute a policy in the Clinton Insurance Company of New York, for eleven months, the remainder of the year. After Mrs. Nill had talked the matter over fully with her husband, she accepted the Clinton policy, and returned that of the Imperial.

Thus matters remained, so far as all parties to this action knew, until August 9, 1882, when the mill was burned. Mr. Nill gave notice of the loss the same day by letter received on August 10, to the Clinton's agents, now Brown & Beggs, claiming under the Clinton policy, and on the latter date he received a telegram to come to Harrisburg the next day, and to bring with him the Clinton policy. On the 11th he went to Harrisburg with this policy and was told by Mr. Brown that about the first of August the Clinton Company had ordered its policy canceled and that he had issued one in the Lancashire (the defendant) in its stead, but neglected to send it to Mrs. Nill.

Mr. Nill hesitated about giving up the Clinton policy and accepting that of the Lancashire; but being assured by Brown that the Lancashire was a first class company, he surrendered the Clinton policy and took the Lancashire home with him. The Lancashire Company's general officers were ignorant of all these facts; but being advised by Brown & Beggs that they had a loss on the mill in question, they sent a man to inquire into it; and upon learning the facts regarding the issuance of the policy, they refused to pay.

The plaintiff, accordingly, brought an action of debt on the Lancashire Company's policy of insurance to which the defendant pleaded payment non est factum and never indebted. Notice of special matter was also given to the effect that the defendant would show that the policy was not delivered nor the premium paid until after the fire.

Upon the trial of the cause, plaintiff's counsel offered to prove by Mr. Nill, among other things, that this property had been previously insured in the Clinton Insurance Company; that the witnesses, acting for the insured party, was notified by Mr. Brown that, the Clinton Insurance Company being unwilling to accept or continue the risk, he had placed the property in the defendant Company at the date which appears upon the policy in suit; that he (Brown) had issued this policy on the 28th of July, 1882, but that he had held it up by inadvertence; and immediately upon ascertaining the loss of the property, he had notified the witness to come to Harrisburg and bring with him his Clinton policy; that, pursuant to that notice, he went to Harrisburg on the 11th day of August, following the fire, and at the request of Brown, the agent, surrendered the Clinton policy and received the policy in suit from Brown's hands, Brown stating at the time that the policy had been regularly issued on the 28th of July, and that he had neglected to send it to the party insured.

Objected to, because there is no sufficient evidence of the agency of Brown, and a large portion of it is of a character that could not be testified to by the agent, being mere declarations of the agent himself outside of the line of his duty.

Objection overruled, the court holding that the agency of Brown & Beggs was made out prima facie, by the fact that they were in possession of policies of the Company under the seal of the Company. Fourth assignment of error.

Plaintiff's counsel offered the policy of the Lancashire Insurance Company in evidence.

Objected to, on the ground that there was no evidence to establish the policy as the act of the Lancashire Insurance Company.

Objection overruled. Second assignment of error.

The defendant presented, inter alia, the following points:

1. That it being admitted by T. J. Nill, agent of his wife, that he had issued to the wife a policy of insurance in the Clinton Fire Insurance Company of New York, in June, 1883, for eleven months, for which he paid $37.50, and that the said policy was accepted by the wife and was in her possession at the date of the fire, the claim against said Clinton Company being a valid claim upon which the wife could have recovered the amount of said policy, she cannot recover against the defendant.

Ans. I do not affirm this point. If you find that Brown was the agent of Mrs. Nill for the purpose of accepting a policy of insurance from the Lancashire Company, according to my instructions already given; if he had implied authority from the course of their previous dealings to put Mrs. Nill into this company or that company at his option, and that thus he was her agent, for the purpose of selecting the company and for the purpose of accepting a policy in any one of these companies, then when he canceled the Clinton Company's policy, and did accept a policy in the Lancashire Company, that was an end of the Clinton Company's insurance, and it was no longer operative, and the Lancashire Company would be bound. Sixth assignment of error.

2. The Clinton Company, through its agents and managers, could not rescind or cancel the policy made to Mrs. Nill in June, 1883, without the consent of Mrs. Nill, or without reasonable notice to her of their purpose to rescind, and in this case no such notice was given.

Ans. The Clinton Company could not rescind its policy without the consent of Mrs. Nill, or, at least, without due notice to her; and no such notice was given. But if Mr. Brown was her agent, with implied authority, in the manner I have spoken of, to transfer her from one company to another and to receive a policy for her, then I say that the notice given to Brown by the Clinton Company, and his consent to the cancellation of the policy, was hers, and that this point raises no obstacle to her recovery. Seventh assignment of error.

4. That an agent of an insurance company has no authority to insure property already destroyed; and a policy written and intended as a substitute for a subsisting policy in another company but not delivered, and of which the assured had no knowledge until after the property is destroyed, is not a valid contract of insurance.

Ans. I affirm this point in its general terms, but not without qualification with reference to the circumstances of the case. An agent of an insurance company has no authority to insure property already destroyed. But Mrs. Nill, through her counsel, contends that this property was insured before it was destroyed, because this policy is dated the 28th of July; and she claims that it was delivered to her on the first of August (that is, delivered to Brown as her agent) and that that was a delivery before the property was destroyed. If you find that there was no delivery, under the instructions we have given you, until after the property was destroyed, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and the point is well taken. But if a policy is written and intended as a substitute for a subsisting policy in another company, and it is delivered before the fire occurs, then that the assured had no knowledge until after the property was destroyed does not affect it, if in point of fact the agent had the authority, express or implied, to change from one company to another, and was the agent of the insured for the purpose of accepting a policy. Ninth assignment of error.

5. T. J. Nill, the agent of his wife, having stated in his evidence that he held the Clinton policy at the time of the fire; that he gave notice under it to the company; that he paid his money on that policy and no other; that he knew nothing of the existence of the policy under which the plaintiff's claim until after the fire, that is to say, on the 11th of August, the fire having occurred on the 9th of August; that he received the policy on said 11th of August; that he never knew of or authorized the substitution of the Lancashire for the Clinton, the said policy is not a valid contract upon which the plaintiff can recover in this case.

Ans. I cannot affirm this point. First of all, it assumes certain facts as existing which are not conceded and which you must ascertain for yourselves; as, for instance, it assumes that Mr. Nill's testimony was to the effect that he gave notice under the Clinton Company's policy to that company. But it is for you to say whether he did or not, under the instructions I have already given you. This point, therefore, I cannot affirm in the language in which it is stated; and I must submit the matter to you on the instructions I have already given you, without repeating them. If you once decide that this policy was duly issued by and was the deed of the Lancashire Company, that the preliminary conditions were fulfilled and that the premium was paid, then the question resolves itself very much into this: whether, under all the circumstances of the case, Mr. Brown was really the agent of Mrs. Nill as well as for the company; that is to say, whether he was her agent for the purpose of placing the insurance wherever he thought best and for her. If you be of that opinion, then the matter stated in this point would not prevent recovery by her. Tenth assignment of error.

The court charged the jury inter alia as follows:

When the Clinton Company's policy was canceled, the Clinton Company must refund a portion, namely: three quarters of the premium which its agent held in his hand for the whole year, from May 1, 1883. I suppose $31.95 which we find in this policy would be the amount.

Then, if the Clinton Company would have to refund that sum, and he (Brown), being its agent and having its moneys in his hands, canceled the policy, it is contended, and it seems to me properly, that he would then have in his hands $31.95 of Mrs. Nill's money to appropriate to some other insurance; and then he appropriated it to pay the premium for $1,500 insurance for nine months, making the remainder of the year, in the Lancashire Company. And thus it would seem, if these be the facts of the case, that Mrs. Nill did pay the premium, $31.95, in this way; Brown & Beggs acting as her agents in this business of transferring the policy from one company to the other, they being the agents for all these companies and acting for Mrs. Nill in making these transfers. It would seem, thus, that she did pay the premium for this insurance of nine months, supposing you to accept the evidence of Mr. Nill in regard to these transactions." Fifth assignment of error.

Verdict for plaintiff, in the sum of $1,782.50, and judgment thereon.

The defendant took this writ, assigning for error, inter alia, the answer to the above points, the assignments above mentioned, the portion of the charge above quoted, and the action of the court in submitting the question to the jury whether the policy of the Clinton Insurance Company had not been canceled and the defendant's policy issued before the fire, there being no evidence thereof in submitting to the jury the question whether Brown & Beggs had authority from Mrs. Nill to cancel the Clinton policy and accept the policy of defendant, there being no evidence of such agency; in admitting the policy in evidence; and in admitting Brown's declarations concerning the issuance of the policy, there being no legal evidence of the agency.

Messrs. F. M. Kimmell and Sharp & Alleman, for plaintiff in error:

Only one policy was intended to be in force at the time of the fire. Unless Brown & Beggs had authority from Mrs. Nill, not only to procure insurance for her but also to cancel her policies at pleasure, and without consulting either her or her immediate agent, only the Clinton policy attached at the time of the fire.

Stebbins v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 65; Massasoit Mills v. Western Ins. Co. 125 Mass. 110.

Brown & Beggs never had such authority and the Lancashire policy, therefore, did not become a binding contract. Even if the agents, Kauffman & Brown, were the agents of Mrs. Nill to place the insurance originally, that did not constitute them or Brown & Beggs agents to receive notice from the Company of the cancellation of the Clinton policy. This has been flatly held in a case reversing the court below in Grace v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 278 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 932). It was not only necessary to the cancellation of the Clinton policy that the assured should be notified of the cancellation, but the unearned premium must have been returned.

May, Ins. ed. 1882, § 67.

The execution of the policy in suit was not proved.

There was proof only that the policy in suit, purporting to be that of the defendant, was in the possession of Brown & Beggs.

The seal of a private corporation does not prove itself.

Farmers & M. Turnpike Co. v. McCullough, 25 Pa. 303; Angell & Ames, Corp. § 226 and cases cited.

Mr. Jno. Stewart, for defendants in error:

The rule is well settled that where some evidence of agency has been given, it is competent to give in evidence the acts and declarations of the alleged agents respecting the subject matter of their authority.

Cent. Pa. Telephone & Supply Co. v. Thomson, 17 W. N. C. 331; S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 544.

The fact that when the policy was in the hands of Brown & Beggs it was already executed by the chief officer of the Company would have been sufficient of itself to admit the acts and declarations of the alleged agents; for it is sufficient to establish agency in itself.

Lightbody v. North Am. Ins. Co. 23 Wend. 18.

On the plea of non est factum, wherever there is a spark of evidence of sealing and delivering, the court is bound to permit the instrument to be read; for it is not for it but the jury to judge of the fact.

Berks & Dauphin Turnpike Road v. Myers and Sigfried v. Loran, 6 Serg. & R. 15, 310; Scott v. Gallagher, 11 Serg. & R. 350; Hamsher v. Kline, 57 Pa. 402.

A general authority to represent the plaintiff in all matters relating to the particular insurance would be sufficient warrant for Brown & Beggs to accept notice of cancellation for the insured.

Standard Oil Co. v. Triumph Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 85; Hermann v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 707.

Stebbins v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 60 N. H. 65 cited and relied upon by the defendant, is inapplicable, as it was not attempted in that case to show any implied or express authority in the broker, who placed the insurance, to do anything beyond.

Mr. Justice Gordon, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is all wrong. In the very outstart under the defendant's plea of non est factum, it was the plaintiffs' business to prove the execution of the policy sued upon; but this was not done; nevertheless, the court, notwithstanding the defendant's objection, admitted it and sent it to the jury, with the instruction that they should treat it as the defendant's deed if they found that it was countersigned by Brown & Beggs, and if they were also satisfied that these persons were the company's agents.

In this there was double error, for neither was the execution of the policy proved, nor the agency of Brown & Beggs. "It purports," says the court, "to have been signed by Henry Robinson, the United States manager, and countersigned by Brown & Beggs at Harrisburg. Mr. Nill tells you that it was received by him from Mr. Brown, of the firm of Brown & Beggs, and that Brown & Beggs claimed to be the general agents of the Company at Harrisburg; he treated with them as such. Then you are told further that the adjuster, or one representing himself to be the adjuster of the Company, came here and saw Mr. Nill in reference to the fire."

All this, however, is assumption without evidence for its support. We have examined the testimony in vain, in order to discover such proof as would warrant the submission of such statements to the jury. There is nothing to show that either Henry Robinson or Brown & Beggs had any authority whatever to sign or countersign the defendant's policies. In this branch of the case, therefore, the plaintiff signally failed, and the court should so have instructed the jury. But admitting the execution of the policy and the agency of Brown & Beggs, and still the plaintiff was not entitled to the verdict.

The court directed the jury to determine whether Brown & Beggs were not acting as agents as well for the plaintiff as for the Lancashire Company. Of this, however, there was no evidence; the very contrary. Nill obtained the Clinton policy from these agents and paid them the premium through the medium of the postoffice, and never had a personal interview with either of them until the 11th of August following. Mrs. Nill had no agent but her husband nor was any other necessary.

She desired no change; the Clinton policy was perfectly good, and could not be canceled without notice to her; and neither she nor her husband knew of the action of Brown & Beggs until the date above mentioned, which was after the loss, when these men imposed alike on Nill and the defendant by inducing him to surrender the Clinton policy and accept the one now in suit. A brief history of this transaction is found in his affidavit of the 17th of August, 1882, wherein Nill testifies:

"On Friday morning, the 11th instant, I took the 8:23 A. M. train at Greencastle for Harrisburg, arriving there about 11 A. M. I went from the depot to Brown & Beggs' office, where I was obliged to wait till after 12 M. before I saw said Mr. Brown. Mr. Brown came to the office. He had to tell me the Clinton Insurance Company had, about the first of August, 1882, canceled their policy on the said mill, and that he had put us in the Lancashire Fire Company; but he neglected to notify us of the change. I then asked him if it would make any difference in the exchange, or whether our rights would be affected or prejudiced by the exchange. He, the said Brown, then said it would not, as the company he had put it in was a first class company. I then gave him, the said Brown, the said Clinton policy, and he gave me the Lancashire policy. This was the first notice we had received of any change or any desire for a change."

From what is here said, and it accords strictly with his evidence given on the trial of the case, it is very clear that Brown's previous action was without warrant from the insured; and it will, we presume, hardly be pretended that had Nill, on the 11th of August, refused to surrender the Clinton policy, Brown's pretended cancellation of it would have released that company from its obligation to Mrs. Nill. But if the Clinton policy was still in force on the 11th of August, 1882, two days after the fire, the action of Brown & Beggs in the delivery of the Lancashire policy as a substitute for that of the Clinton Company was a mere attempt to shift the loss from the company upon whom it had fallen to the other, which at the time of the fire had assumed no responsibility.

It requires no argument to show that this could not be done and that the attempt to accomplish a design of this kind was a fraud on the defendant. Neither does it appear from the evidence that the defendant received a premium as a consideration for its policy. The court allowed the jury to infer that as Brown & Beggs were agents for both the Companies as well as for Mrs. Nill, and as, on the cancellation of the first policy, the unearned part of the premium must be refunded, therefore, these agents received this money thus due the plaintiff, and paid it on the Lancashire policy. This might have been so, but as there was no evidence of it, the court ought not to have devised and sent to the jury a theory that had no foundation in fact. Following the regular order of business, the return premium would not be payable to the insured until the policy had been surrendered, and, of course, until after that time there was nothing in the hands of Brown & Beggs belonging to the plaintiff which could be paid to the defendant.

Thus, however we view this case, we discover no foundation of fact upon which it can rest, or which could warrant a submission of it to the jury.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and a new venire awarded.

John FUNK'S ADMRS., Piffs. in Err.,

WAYNESBORO' SCHOOL DISTRICT.

1. Proceedings, instituted by a board of school directors, to assess damages for taking lands for school purposes, under the Act of April 9, 1867, may be discontinued at any time before final confirmation of the proceedings, or the taking of actual possession of the land.
2. Staking off land prior to a view for assessment of damages, is not such possession as to give title. (Beale v. Pa. R. Co. 86 Pa. 510, distinguished.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to the Common Pleas of Franklin County, to review the record of the court, vacating proceedings for the assessment of damages for lands taken for school purposes. Affirmed.

Reported below, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 422.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The assignments of error were to the action of the court: 1, in allowing the withdrawal of the original petition and the subsequent proceedings in the case; and 2, in ordering the rule for a discontinuance to be made absolute and decreeing that all the proceedings be vacated.

Messrs. F. M. Kimmel and John Stewart, for plaintiffs in error:

Whenever the board of directors or controllers of any school district in this Commonwealth shall be unable to procure an eligible site for the erection of school houses therein, as they may deem expedient, by agreement with the owner or owners of the land, it shall and may be lawful for the board of directors, in behalf of the district, to enter upon and occupy sufficient ground for the purposes, which they shall designate and mark off, not exceeding in any case one acre; and to use and occupy the same for the purpose of erecting thereon a school house, with its necessary or convenient appurtenances; and for all damage done and suffered, or which shall accrue to the owner or owners of such land, by reason of the taking of the same for the purposes aforesaid, the funds of the district which may be raised by taxation, shall be pledged and deemed as security; and it shall and may be lawful for the court of common pleas of the proper county, on application thereto by petition, to appoint a jury of viewers who shall establish and determine the quantity and value of said land so taken, to be used for the purposes aforesaid, and who shall estimate and determine whether any, and if any what amount of, damages has been or may be sustained and to whom payable, and make report thereof to said court; and if damage be awarded and the report be confirmed by the said court, judgment shall be entered thereon.

Act of April 9, 1876, 1 Purd. Dig. p. 807, pl. 172.

No entry for experimental survey is required for the school board, nor does the Act contemplate any. It makes its selection of a site, determines upon the amount of land required, designates and marks it off, and then proceeds to enter and occupy. It is as absolutely the property of the school district, under the statute ute, immediately upon its appropriation of it as it would have been had it paid a price agreed upon and taken a conveyance. Payment precedes the appropriation of the land only where the price has been agreed upon; where it cannot be agreed upon, the appropriation is made, leaving the price to be determined according to law. The extent or degree of appropriation is unimportant; it cannot affect the principle whether it be simply an entry and marking off, or actual subjection of the property to the proposed improvements.

Where a railroad has been located and the land has been taken and appropriated for the public use, the right of the land owner to sue for his damages is complete, and he may recover all which may be caused by the location and the subsequent construction.

Wadhams v. Lackawanna & Bloomsburg R. Co. 42 Pa. 810.

The question of damages depends on the taking, that is to say the appropriation of the property to railroad purposes.

Heise v. Pa. R. R. Co. 62 Pa. 72.

The appropriation of the land by a railroad company is completed upon the location of the road; and after the assessment of the damages, though the report has not been confirmed, the right of the land owner to the damages is vested, and cannot be divested by an abandonment of the original location.

Beale v. Pa. R. R. Co. 86 Pa. 510.

"There is nothing in the letter or spirit (of the Acts) which will permit the company to roam at pleasure over a person's land, changing the route as often as it is dissatisfied with the amount of damages assessed, thereby defeating the action of the court in a case pending. The recognition of such a power would be fraught with too great mischief to be sanctioned by any just rule in the administration of the law."

Beale v. Pennsylvania R. R. supra; Neal v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 31 Pa. 20.

And of what consequence is it that the cases cited are the cases of private corporations? How do municipal corporations acquire any higher rights of eminent domain? Their rights are conferred alike by statute, and neither can acquire any right of eminent domain except for public purposes. It will not do to say that in the one case the right is conferred for purely public purposes, in distinction to the other, because it may result in private advantage. The law makes no distinction of this kind, and the right can be conferred only for public purposes.

The security being given in due course of law, the grasp of the owner upon his property is loosened by the Constitution itself; and consequently the easement acquired passes freed from his power to obtain payment otherwise than upon the bond, and the proceeding by assessment of damages given by the law.

Fries v. Southern Pennsylvania R. R. & M. Co. 85 Pa. 75.

Dillon's statement of the law amounts to nothing more than that, under the language by which the power to open streets is usually conferred, there may be an abandonment of the proceeding.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 473, p. 572, ed. 1873.

In case of a site for a school house, the conditions precedent to the appointment of viewers are: 1. an entry and appropriation of the land; and 2, a failure to agree with the owner as to the price. These must both be affirmed in the petition, and the viewers are appointed to determine the market value of the property taken, not with a view to enable the school board to decide whether the advantage from the proposed improvement will justify the expenditure, but solely to determine what the parties themselves could not decide, viz.: what is the fair and honest value of the property taken.

Messrs. O. C. Bowers and W. T. Omwake, for defendant in error:

If the right or title, such as the District takes, vests immediately upon the inception of the proceedings, and if the District be held to take the fee, then an abandonment of the proceedings (it might be argued) would leave the fee in the School District, and yet defeat the owner of the price.

The learned judge below seemed to regard this as a material question and, after a careful examination of it, arrived at the conclusion that the fee passes. In this we think he was in error.

"Where the purposes for which the land was taken is as well met by construing the authority to warrant the taking of an easement only, as of the fee, the grant, if doubtful, is to be construed most favorably for the citizen."

Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. §§ 603, 604.

The words of the Act of April 9, 1867, are: "It shall be lawful for the board of directors, on behalf of the district, to enter upon and occupy sufficient ground for the purposes * * * and to use and occupy the same for the purpose of erecting thereon a school house," etc. If the Legislature intended the fee to pass it would not have stopped at granting the simple right of "use and occupancy;" and we submit that these words are not sufficient to confer the right to take the fee.

Again; the statute gives to the owner only damages, not the price and value of the land.

In Long v. Fuller, 68 Pa. 170, it was held by the court below that the school district takes only an easement under the Act of 1867. The judgment was affirmed by this court, but that question was not referred to in the opinion.

Municipal corporations may, at any time before taking possession of the property under completed proceedings or before the final confirmation, recede from or discontinue the proceedings they have instituted. This may be done, unless it is otherwise provided by legislative enactment, at any time before vested rights in others have attached.

"The mere laying out streets, etc., for a city, under the Act of June 16, 1836, and its supplement, or under the general road law, is not of itself a taking of the property of individuals by the right of eminent domain, recognized in the Constitution; and it is only when they are actually opened and applied to public use that the owners are entitled to receive compensation."

Matter of Pittsburgh, 2 Watts & S. 820.

In Yost's Report, 17 Pa. 531, the difference between public and private corporations in matters of this kind is insisted upon, where it is said that private corporations exercise their privilege for their own advantage, the public advantage being only an incident.

The case of Beale v. Pa. R. R. Co. 86 Pa. 509, is not in point and does not rule the case at bar: 1. That was a case of a private corporation taking land for its own private benefit; whereas, this is a case of a public agent acting in behalf of and for the good of the public alone. 2. In that case there was no effort to discontinue or withdraw the proceedings, nor even to amend them, which this court intimated might properly have been done. The only question before the court there was the sufficiency of an exception to the report of viewers, filed on behalf of the railroad company.

This exception, it should be observed, was not taken to any act or omission or irregularity on the part of the viewers, but was based upon the act of the railroad company itself, viz.: an alleged change of route. This, we submit, was not the subject of exception on the company's part, and could only have been reached by a motion to amend the proceedings or to withdraw them, with a view to beginning de novo. The exception was declared insufficient; but the question at issue here did not and could not arise in that case.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 27th of January, 1886, the School Board of Waynesboro filed in the court of common pleas a petition which, as it sets forth all the facts involved in the present controversy, we give in extenso.

"That on the 25th day of October, A. D. 1884, your petitioners presented their petition to the court, asking for the appointment of viewers to view and assess damages for taking by your petitioners of certain lands (of John Funk of H.) for school purposes, said lands being situated in the Town of Waynesboro, in said County of Franklin. That viewers were appointed in accordance with said petition who made report to the court on December 1, 1884, which report was ordered to be confirmed unless a review should be asked for on or before the first day of the next regular term. That before the first day of the regular term, to wit: on the third of December, 1884, a petition was filed by your petitioners, and reviewers appointed by the court, who made report to the court on the 23d day of February, 1885, only embracing however in their view and report a portion of the premises embraced in their first view. That said report was, on the 23d day of February, confirmed nisi, and on July 28, 1885, exceptions to said report were (on behalf of your petitioners) filed by leave of court. That neither of said reports was ever confirmed absolutely.

"Your petitioners further represent that they have never entered upon or occupied the said lands further than to stake off the same, prior to the first view; and that they desire to formally abandon said lands for school purposes, so that the same may remain to the said John Funk of H. for his own use, occupation and enjoyment, without hindrance or interference from your petitioners. Your petitioners, therefore, pray the court for leave to withdraw all their proceedings aforesaid by payment by them of all costs accrued thereon."

On this petition a rule was issued to the administrators of the estate of the said John Funk, deceased, commanding them to show cause why the prayer of the said school directors should not be granted; and on the 26th of March, 1886, after hearing the parties, the court made the rule absolute, and vacated the previous proceedings. The rectitude of this action is now called in question by the plaintiffs in error, and it is argued that the court acted ultra vires. We are, however, not convinced that there is any such error as requires our intervention to correct. The entry of the directors was not permanent; they had no actual possession of the land, hence, did not interfere with that of the owner.

The report of the viewers had not been confirmed, so that the matter was still within the jurisdiction and power of the court; and, under circumstances such as these, we cannot see why a discontinuance might not be allowed as at common law. It is certainly so in road cases; for, until the court of quarter sessions finally confirms the report of reviewers, the proceedings may be set aside or abandoned.

As was said by this court in the Matter of Pittsburg, 2 Watts & S. 320: the mere laying out or location of streets is not a dedication of the land upon which they are laid to the use of the public, but only an indication of what may thereafter be so dedicated; and until they are actually opened the land owner is entitled to no damages.

It would follow, of course, that if they were never opened, or if the locations were abandoned, there could be no damages, neither could the owner have any standing to assert what was but a possible claim. So, we have it from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 8d ed. § 808, that where municipal corporations have the power to take private property for public use, they may, at any time before taking possession thereof under completed proceedings or before final confirmation, recede from or discontinue the proceedings they have instituted. He adds: "Until assessment of damages has been made, the amount cannot be known; and it is reasonable that after having ascertained the expenses of the project the corporation should have a discretion to go on with it or not as it sees fit." For the doctrine here quoted he cites a multitude of authorities from the courts of our sister States.

Now it will be seen in the case in hand, that the school directors had no possession of the property in controversy, other than such as the public would have on the laying out of a road or street, so that the case cited is in point. Clearly, if the court of quarter sessions should, before the final confirmation of a road, discover that the expenses of its opening and maintenance were too much for the township to bear, it might for that reason alone refuse such confirmation; and it was quite as reasonable to allow a board of school directors the right to recede from its resolution to build a school house, as soon as it discovered that the price of the land which it proposed to improve was greater than the District could meet without oppression to its taxpayers.

But we are met with the case of Beale v. Pa. R. Co. 86 Pa. 509, in which we held that after a railroad company had made a location on the land of the appellant, and damages therefor had been assessed, it was too late to interpose an exception that it had subsequently adopted a new line on the same land.

But that case is not similar to the one now trying; that was a private, this a public corporation; the one had in view its own profit, and the other the public welfare; so that we might well allow a discretion to the latter that we would not to the former.

Besides this, no one would contend that the same rule would apply to a mere preliminary or trial survey as to a permanent location. Moreover, that the court might have taken this change of location into consideration on a motion to amend, and refer the matter back to the viewers, is admitted by the learned justice who delivered the opinion in that case. But if so, we cannot see why consideration might not also have been taken of the fact, had it been so, that the company had altogether withdrawn from the land. Whether, however, this be so or not, it is clear that the point now before us was not involved in that case; and it cannot, therefore, be used as authority to impeach the action of the court below.

The judgment is affirmed.

COUNTY OF ERIE, Piff. in Err.,
c.

COMMISSIONERS OF WATER WORKS
OF the City of ERIE.

1. The Act of May 14, 1874, entitled
"An Act to Exempt from Taxation Public property Used for Public Purposes,"

NOTE.—The question of the constitutionality of the Act of May 14, 1874, although not passed upon in this case, is an interesting and important one.

Judge Trunkay, when president judge of Venango County, used the following language:

which exempts certain property and contains a proviso that "All property, real or personal, other than that which is in actual use and occupation for the purposes aforesaid and from which any income or revenue is derived, shall be subject to taxation; and nothing herein contained shall exempt the same," imposes taxation upon public property used for public purposes, from which a revenue is derived.

2. Property belonging to a municipality, owned and used by commissioners, appointed by law, in operating and carrying on water works to supply the public with water, and necessary for such purpose, from which a revenue is derived, is taxable under the Act of May 14, 1874.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Erie County, to review a judgment in favor of defendants on a case stated. Reversed.

Reported below, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 547.

The following facts appear by the case stated:

The Commissioners of the Water Works in the City of Erie are a quasi corporation created by Act of April 4, 1867, P. L. 768, and Act of April 2, 1868, P. L. 610. The defendants are the legal owners of five water lots in the City of Erie, and land adjoining the same, upon which is erected a stand pipe, engine house, pumping house, and machinery necessary for the pumping of and supplying water to the inhabitants of the City of Erie; and the defendants are also the legal owners of about seven and one half acres of land in the City of Erie, upon which a reservoir has been built, which contains, in part, the water supply of said city, and is in constant use in connection with the water works of said city.

The property is necessary in operating and carrying on said works, to supply the public with water. The defendants acquired title to said property in pursuance and by authority of the above mentioned Acts of Assembly, and erected the said water works, and have been and are now operating them in pursuance of the provisions of said Acts of Assembly. The money with which the original works were built was raised by the sale of bonds issued by the City of Erie to the amount of $875,000, which bonds were delivered by the City of Erie to the Water Commissioners in compliance with the terms of section 5 of the Act of April 4, 1867.

No part of the principal of said bonds has been paid, and the interest thereon has always been and now is paid by the City of Erie. The revenue derived from said water works has been and is now received and expended by said

"The Act of May 14, 1874, exempts certain property from taxation and does nothing else. It was enacted in pursuance of section 1, article 9 of the Constitution. The proviso relates to property not in actual use and occupation for the purposes of exemption. It makes nothing liable to taxation which is not liable under some former Act, when not taken out by an exempting statute. This Act and proviso, as a whole, only exempts, as the title imports; therefore it is unnecessary to say that if any part authorized taxation, it would be a violation of section 3, article 3 of the Constitution."

The provision of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, article III., § 3, is: "No bill, except general appropriation bills, shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

In Re Road in Phoenixville, 2 Chester Co. R. 433, Judge Sterrett says: "The title must not only embrace the subject of proposed legislation, but also express the same so clearly and fully as to give notice of the legislative purpose to those who may be specially interested therein." And again: "The intention [of the Constitution] was to require that the real purpose of the bill should not be disguised or covered by language calculated to mislead."

A statute entitled "An Act Relating to Boroughs in the County of Chester," which imposed the payment of damages upon the county, for the appropriation of lands for streets, was held unconstitutional because the title did not give notice to the county.

Re Road in Phoenixville, supra.

On the argument of the case, Judge Trunkay said: "The necessity for notice to the county exists, PA.

whether the liability is imposed by direct enactment or by the repeal of former legislation."

Chief Justice Mercur suggested that the title to that Act should probably have been "An Act Relating to Boroughs and Imposing Certain Liability on the County."

Montgomery County's Appeal, post, 303.

In construing a statute entitled "An Act Relating to Streets in the several Boroughs of Montgomery County," Judge Gordon, in delivering the opinion of the court, says that if the Act imposed upon the county the payment of damages it would be unconstitutional, since the title affords no notice that it embraces anything relative to the county; but holds that the provision as to assessment of damages does not include payment, and that the county is therefore not liable.

Judges Paxson and Green, in an opinion by Judge Paxson, dissented from this position, holding that the title affected the taxpayers of the county with notice of any legislation concerning those streets, whether it relates to the assessment of damages or otherwise, in this respect distinguishing the case from that of Road in Phoenixville, supra.

A comparison of the Acts shows that the title of the Chester County Act referred to boroughs, a division of the county, and therefore gave notice only to boroughs, while in the view taken by Judges Paxson and Green, the Montgomery County Act referred to streets in boroughs, and accordingly gave notice to the whole county.

Under the decision in Montgomery County's App. it seems that the Chester County Act would have been declared unconstitutional if the title had been "An Act Relating to Streets in the Boroughs of Chester County." Under this title, quære, whether Judges Paxson and Green would not, for the reasons given above, have held the Act constitutional.

Water Commissioners. No part of said revenue has ever been paid to the City of Erie; but the entire revenue, all of which is received from water rents, after payment of the actual operating expenses, repairs, and enlargement of works, has been used from year to year in extending the water supply to parts of the city not supplied. The surplus revenue for the year 1885, over and above running expenses, was about $85,000, all of which was expended in enlarging the works and in making extensions as aforesaid.

The Commissioners have never paid any taxes to the Commonwealth upon said property in any form, nor do they now pay any such taxes; but the bonds issued by the city, as aforesaid, have been and are taxed for state purposes. For the year 1885 the assessors assessed the property above mentioned, belonging to the Water Commissioners aforesaid; and the county commissioners laid a tax thereon, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $280.02, payment of which has been duly demanded and refused.

If, upon the facts stated, the court be of the opinion that said property is legally subject to taxation for county purposes, as aforesaid, then judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendants for $280.02 and costs of suit; but if the court be of the opinion that said property is not taxable for the purposes aforesaid, then judgment to be entered in favor of the defendants for costs, either party to be entitled to a writ of error.

Judgment for defendants. The plaintiff then took this writ, assigning for error the action of the court in entering judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Frank Gunnison, for plaintiff in error, besides the argument stated in the preceding case, contended that Chadwick v. Maginnes, 94 Pa. 117, decided that public property used for

The Act of May 14, 1874, construed above, is entitled "An Act Exempting from Taxation Public Property Used for Public Purposes." The Act is held to impose a tax upon public property used for public purposes, from which a revenue is derived. And Judge Green, in his opinion, also holds that it imposes tax upon all other property not exempted therein, both public and private.

The converse of the above case was presented in the Act of June 30, 1885. The title was "A Further Supplement to an Act entitled 'An Act to Provide Revenue by Taxation.'" It was provided in section 20 that the taxes laid upon manufacturing corporations, under the revenue laws, should be abolished. Schuyler, P. J., of the Common Pleas of Northampton County, suggested a doubt as to the constitutionality of the Act under article III, § 3 of the Constitution; but the supreme court declined to consider this question, as it was not necessary to the decision. Paxson, J., delivering the opinion, said:

"Even if the section amounted to an unlawful exemption from taxation * * * the exemption would fall and leave the balance of the Act in full force. The Act is complete without this section."

An Act entitled "An Act Concerning Husband and Wife," which removed the disabilities of married women to make contracts was held to sufficiently express the subject in the title. Barnett v. Harshbarger (Ind.) 3 West. Rep. 570.

A statute entitled "An Act in Relation to Streets in Union Township, Union County" was held unconstitutional in New Jersey, the court, Beasley, 224

C. J., saying: "It will, on a moment's thought, be perceived how general such an allusion to the legislative purpose is. It is true that it may be difficult to indicate, by a formula, how specialized the title of a statute must be; but is not difficult to conclude that it must mean something in the way of being a notice of what is doing. Unless it does this, it can answer no useful end. It is not enough that it embraces the legislative purpose, it must express it; and where the language is too general it will accomplish the former, but not the latter. Thus, a law entitled 'An Act for a Certain Purpose' would embrace any subject but would express none; and consequently it would not stand the constitutional test. And so a law entitled 'An Act in Relation to Silk Goods' would not indicate, in the faintest outline, a purpose to incorporate a body for the manufacture of such fabrics. Such titles would be idle and inefficacious for every purpose." Township of Union v. Rader, 89 N. J. L. 509.

Mr. Buckalew in his work on the Constitution of Pennsylvania, p. 69, 1st ed. classifies titles to statutes, open to objection under article III, § 3, as follows:

"1, Those which are vague, uncertain, indeterminate in expression and meaning; 2, those which are too general, of too wide a sweep, not specific; 3, those which indicate only a part of the bill; 4, those which express or suggest a falsehood, or otherwise misled by the terms used; and 5, those which, for any other reason, do not fairly and fully express the subject matter of the bill." Referring to Cooley, Const. Lim. 141-150, 81-83.

The Constitutions of the following States contain provisions relating to unity of subject and that it shall be expressed in the title: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia.

In New York and Wisconsin the provision only applies to private or local bills.

A provision that if there are other subjects in the bill, not embraced in the title, the bill is nevertheless good as to the subject properly expressed, will be found in the Constitutions of California, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Oregon, Texas and West Virginia.

[J. M.]

public purposes, from which a revenue is derived, is subject to taxation, and therefore ruled this case.

Mr. Theodore A. Lamb, for defendants in error:

A municipal corporation is merely an agency instituted by the Sovereign for the purpose of carrying out in detail the objects of government.

Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169.

The same power that created the agency can change it at will; and in directing that these Water Commissioners should be appointed to erect and carry on these works, at the expense of the city, the Sovereign was merely changing its agents in carrying out a public work.

Philadelphia v. Field, 58 Pa. 320, 329; Perkins v. Slack, 86 Pa. 270, 281.

Private property may be taken for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants with pure water. This is clearly a public use.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 482.

The Commissioners were authorized to condemn any land necessary for the works, which condemnation could only have been authorized for a public use.

Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 530, 531.

The Act does not say that all real and personal property held for public uses, except that named, shall be taxed; the language is: "Shall be subject to taxation." But such property is never taxable by implication.

Directors of Poor v. School Directors, 42 Pa. 25; Louisville v. Commonwealth, 1 Duvall, 295, 296.

The Act of 1874 is an exemption Act, pure and simple.

Coatesville Gas Co. v. Chester Co. 97 Pa. 476.

If it was intended to be anything more, it is unconstitutional.

Art. III, § 8, Const. of 1874.

It is entitled "An Act to Exempt from Taxation, etc." There is not a word in the title showing that the object of the bill was to subject anything to taxation; and yet it is urged that the proviso is a taxing law.

In the case of Union Pass. R. Cos. App., 81* Pa. 91, Judge Agnew says: "When the title conveys the belief that one subject is the purpose of the bill, while another and different one is its real subject, it is evident that it tends to mislead by diverting the attention from the true object of the legislation. Confiding in the title as applicable to a purpose unobjectionable to the reader, he is led away from the examination of the body of the bill. In such a case the subject is not clearly expressed in the title. Indeed, it is not expressed at all."

See also Dorsey's App. 72 Pa. 192.

The title should not mislead or tend to avert inquiry into the contents of the Act.

Allegheny County Home's App. 77 Pa. 79.

In Chadwick v. Maginnes, 94 Pa. 117, it seems to have been conceded that the quasi corporation was a private one; and exemption was claimed only upon the ground that the public works of a private corporation are exempt from taxation, they being taxed in another form.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The difference between this case and that of Erie County v. City of Erie [post, 305], is that the Act of 1874 does contain a clause which directs that "All property, real or personal, other than that which is in actual use and occupation for the purposes aforesaid and from which any income or revenue is derived, shall be subject to taxation." And it is the fact that the property in question here does yield a large revenue to the defendants.

It seems to us that the Legislature, possessing the power, as it does by section 1 of article 9, to provide for the levying and collecting of all taxes, has exercised its power and in such language as to embrace the property here in question. When it says "All property real or personal" which yields revenue shall be subject to taxation, we think the words used must be literally read. Water works are not essential to the administration of municipal government. They are incidental to it and possibly advantageous. If they are conducted without exacting revenue for the water furnished, they would not come within the language of the Act and would not be taxable; but as revenue is derived, the necessary meaning of the language employed embraces them. The fact of municipal ownership is the only matter that creates any doubt; but the provision is so broad and so peremptory that we think the liability to taxation was intended to be created without any regard to the public or private character of the ownership. It cannot be said that there was any want of consciousness of the fact, on the part of the Legislature, that it was dealing with public property; for that was one of the classes of property which it was exempting. Then, in contrast with this, it provides that all property, real or personal, other than that which is in actual use and occupation for the purposes aforesaid and from which any income or revenue is derived, shall be subject to taxation.

The excepted property referred to includes certain kinds of public property but does not include the particular kind in question here; hence it is not embraced within the exception and is included in the general designation "all property." It would doubtless be entirely proper for the Legislature to exempt all public property, used for public purposes, from taxation without qualification; but as it has not done so, we have no discretion and must enforce the law as it is written.

The judgment is reversed and judgment is now entered on the case stated, for $230.02 in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, with costs of suit.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY'S APPEAL.

RE Application to Lay out and Open AIRY STREET, in the Borough of Royersford.

1. A statute which is entitled "An Act Relating to Streets in Several Boroughs of Montgomery County," which provides that the damages for locating streets shall be assessed under the general road laws, does not impose the payment of the damages upon the county, under the general road laws, and the statute is, therefore, not unconstitutional under article XI, § 8 of the Constitution of 1838. (Article III, § 8 of the Constitution of 1874.)

2. Paxson and Green, JJ., concurring on the ground that while the Act does impose the payment of damages upon the county, the title of the Act sufficiently gives notice to the taxpayers. (Distinguishing Road in Phoenixville, 2 Ches. Co. R. 493.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery County, to review the proceedings dismissing exceptions to the report of viewers laying out a street in a borough and assessing damages. Affirmed.

Reported below, 1 Montg. Co. R. 185; S. C. 2 Ches. Co. R. 565.

The Borough of Royersford was incorporated under the general Borough Act of April 3, 1851. Certain citizens of the Borough, with the consent of the town council, petitioned the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery County for the appointment of a jury to view and lay out a street and assess the damages. A jury was appointed upon said application, the street was laid out, and the damages were assessed. To this report exceptions were filed upon the ground that the damages should have been assessed against the Borough and that the Act of May 9, 1871 (P. L. 1871, p. 689), under which the proceedings were conducted, is unconstitutional.

The Act is entitled "An Act Relating to Streets in the Several Boroughs of Montgomery County," and provides, in section 1:

"That from and after the passage of this Act, the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery County, by and with the consent of the town councils, shall have jurisdiction to inquire of, lay out, open, widen, vacate or change any public street, road or alley within the limits of any incorporated borough in said county, whether said streets and alleys have heretofore been laid out by commissioners appointed by Act of the Legislature or otherwise, in the same manner as is provided by law for the laying out, opening, widening, vacating or changing of other public roads within said county; and damages to the owners of land injured thereby shall be assessed as provided under the general road laws of this Commonwealth."

The Act further provides, in section 2, that the proceedings of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery County, vacating certain streets in the Borough of Norristown, should be ratified, confirmed and made valid; and that said streets be declared vacated.

The court, Boyer, P. J., dismissed the exceptions and confirmed the report. The county commissioners appealed and assigned for error the action of the court in dismissing the exceptions.

Mr. Aaron S. Swartz, for appellant:

Under the general borough laws, the damages sustained by property owners in opening streets, were payable by the boroughs and the benefited properties. There was no liability upon the county to pay such damages.

Act of April 22, 1856, (P. L. § 25).

The sole object of section 1 of said Act of May 9, 1871, was to transfer the burden of paying damages from the borough to the taxpayers of the county.

The title to the Act gives no notice of such proposed change in the assessment and payment of damages; and it also misleads, for it gives the reader the impression that it interests only residents and owners in boroughs.

There is no repealing clause in our Act, and we must so construe it as not to repeal the provisions of any other Act, if such construction be fair and reasonable.

A statute will not be deemed repealed by implication, unless there be a clear and strong inconsistency between the two enactments.

Commonwealth v. Easton Bank, 10 Pa. 442; Egypt Street, 2 Grant, 455.

Mr. E. L. Hallman, for appellees:

The purpose of the Act was to render the payment of damages uniform, under the general Road Act of 1836, bringing all boroughs under this law.

All the presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of the Act of Assembly. It is only in a clear case where the court is justified in declaring an Act to be unconstitutional.

Craig v. First Presby. Church, 88 Pa. 42.

An Act entitled "An Act to Open and Straighten Highland and Union Avenues and Thirtieth Street, in the Twenty-Second Ward, and Church and Adams Streets in the City of Philadelphia," which provided, in the body of the Act, for the assessment of damages was held constitutional.

Matter of Church Street, 54 Pa. 353.

It would not have thrown any more light on it if the Legislature had said: relative to the manner of assessing damages for laying out streets in the several boroughs of Montgomery County. Anyone seeing something relative to all the streets of all the boroughs of the county would certainly notice that a provision for so many highways was something to concern all inhabitants of the county.

If the provisions be upon the subject, or upon matters properly connected with it, the Act must be declared constitutional.

The title need not be a complete index.

Yeager v. Weaver, supra.

There is no restriction in this title, tending to mislead; and mere generality in a title should not avoid a law.

Dorsey's App. 72 Pa. 195; Commonwealth v. Green, supra.

The legislation of the State should not be impaled upon sharp points of criticism which must often bring it to naught, but must receive such an interpretation that it may rather stand than fall.

Allegheny Co. Home's App. 77 Pa. 80; Mauch Chunk v. McGee, 81 Pa. 488; Estling's App. 89 Pa. 205.

All presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of the law; and to prove it otherwise beyond doubt rests upon the plaintiff.

Speer v. School Directors, 50 Pa. 151; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Riblet, 66 Pa. 184. and all the former cases cited bear out this position.

The title of the Act embraces all the streets of all the boroughs in the county; this includes those mentioned in section 2.

Even if the second section were unconstitutional, this would not avoid the first section, which is the main purpose of the Act.

The main purpose of an Act of Assembly will not be avoided by the unconstitutionality of certain of its provisions which were called into life owing to their alternative contingent relations to the other provisions of the Act.

Lea v. Bumm, 3 W. N. C. 835.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

Did the Act of May 9, 1871, entitled "An Act Relating to Streets in the several Boroughs of Montgomery County," impose upon the county the damages assessed to the owners of property on the laying out, opening or widening of streets, roads or alleys in any of the said boroughs, we would agree with the counsel for the county that the Act was unconstitutional and void. In such case the title to the said Act would have to be regarded as wholly defective, since it affords no notice that it embraces anything relative to the county.

But as there is nothing apparent in the statute which at all affects the county or expresses an intention to make such damages payable out of its treasury we cannot for this reason, which has been urged by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, pronounce the Act unconstitutional. It will be observed that both the Borough Act of 1851 and the General Road Law not only provide for the assessment of damages upon the laying out of streets and roads, but also prescribe how they shall be paid; while the Act of 1871 only directs the method by which such damages shall be assessed and says nothing as to their payment.

They are to be assessed under the General Road Act; but as there is no direction for their payment the Borough Act remains in this particular unaltered, and to it we must resort in order to learn how those damages, when ascertained, are to be liquidated.

It is urged, indeed, on part of the defendant in error, that as the damages are to be assessed under the Act of 1836, they must be paid according to the directions of that Act. This might be so if the assessment necessarily involved payment by the county; but it does not, for the two things are essentially different.

There is no reason why the Legislature might not direct that on the taking of land by a railroad company in exercise of its right of eminent domain, the damages to the owner should be assessed under the provisions of the General Road Law; but in such case it would not follow that the county must pay those damages when assessed. It is clear, therefore, that unless the Act of 1871 imposes this burden upon the county it cannot be made to bear it.

This Act must be construed as supplemental to the charters of the several boroughs in the County of Montgomery, and when in them we find provision for the payment of damages, we certainly cannot assume that a supplement which involves only their mode of assessment, is to be extended by implication so as to compel their payment out of the county rather than the borough treasury. It follows that as the court of quarter sessions neither has made nor can make any order affecting the County of Montgomery, it, the said County, has no standing to maintain the certiorari now before us.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the following opinion:

I concur in this judgment, although not for the reasons given by my brother Gordon.

I am of opinion that the Act of May 9, 1871 (P. L. 639), is constitutional, although the effect of it be to put the damages upon the county. That it does put the damages upon the county was conceded by the court below and by the counsel on both sides. It was upon this ground alone that the constitutionality of the Act was assailed; the allegation being that the title of the Act did not give notice to the taxpayers of the county that the county and not the borough would be hereafter liable for the damages arising from the opening of streets in said borough.

The title of said Act refers to streets in the several boroughs of Montgomery County. I think this title affects the taxpayers of the county with notice of any legislation concerning those streets, whether it relates to the assessment of damages or otherwise. In this respect the case differs essentially from that of Road in the Borough of Phoenixville. Legal Int. of July 31, 1885, p. 313 [2 Ches. Co. Rep. 438].

The opinion of the court concedes the Act of May 9, 1871, to be unconstitutional, if it puts the damages on the county, but holds that such is not the effect of the Act. Said Act provides that "Damages to the owners of lands injured thereby shall be assessed as provided under the General Road Laws of the Commonwealth."

The General Road Law provides (Act of 1836) that the damages when assessed shall be paid by the county treasurer out of the county stock.

It will thus be seen that I have reached the same result as the majority of the court, but by a radically different route.

Justice Green concurs with me in this view.

COUNTY OF ERIE, Plff. in Err., v.

CITY OF ERIE.

1. Public property used for public purposes is not subject to taxation, and cannot be without express statute.
2. Article IX, § 1 of the Constitution, providing that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected under general laws, and that public property used for public purposes may, by general laws, be exempt from taxation, does not render such public property taxable.
3. A house and lot and horses, owned by a city and used in operating the fire department of the city, are not liable to taxation.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas of Erie County, to review a judgment in favor of defendant on a case stated. Affirmed.

Reported below in 1 Pa. C. C. R. 540.

The case stated showed the following facts: the City of Erie is a municipal corporation incorporated by Act of April 14, 1851, P. L. 631, and others amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and is located in the County of Erie. The City is the owner of a piece of land in said City, upon which is erected an engine house; the engine house is used exclusively for fire purposes, and is necessary therefor; the said land and building have been assessed for the year 1885 at the sum of $9,140. The City is also the owner of six horses, which are used in operating the fire department of the City, and necessary therefor, which said horses have been assessed at the sum of $600. The county commissioners of Erie County have levied a tax for the year 1885 of three mills upon each dollar of valuation of said real and personal property, amounting to $29.22, payment of which said tax has been duly demanded.

The fire department of the City of Erie is maintained at the expense of the City, to prevent the destruction of property by fire; and no revenue whatever is derived therefrom. If upon the above facts the court should be of the opinion that said property was legally subject to taxation by the County of Erie, then judgment should be given for plaintiff and against the defendant, for $29.22 with costs of suit; but if the court should be of the opinion that said property was not liable to taxation for county purposes, then judgment should be given for defendant for costs, either party to be entitled to a writ of error.

Judgment was entered for defendant. The plaintiff thereupon took this writ, assigning for error the action of the court in entering judgment for the defendant.

Mr. Frank Gunnison, for plaintiff in error:

The Constitution provides that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects.

Art. IX, § 1.

This means a classification of subjects according to their nature, and not according to their ownership.

By the same section the Legislature is given power to exempt, not any particular kind of property, but property owned by the public and used for public purposes, etc.

It follows that it was the intention that no property of a class upon which a tax was levied, by virtue of any existing law, should escape taxation until the Legislature should exempt it, the power to exempt being limited to the property owned and used for the purposes specified in the section.

The only legislation since the adoption of the Constitution is the Act of May 14, 1874 (P. L. 158), and its supplement of June 4, 1879. This Act does not exempt this property, and it is therefore liable.

Chadwick v. Maginnes, 94 Pa. 117.

To make the meaning more clear, the Act of 1874, in the proviso, declares that all other property, except that enumerated in the Act, shall be subject to taxation.

The case of Coatesville Gas Co. v. Chester Co.

97 Pa. 476, decided nothing more than that article IX, §§ 1, 2, of the Constitution, did not execute themselves so as to repeal existing laws providing for the assessment and collection of taxes. Those provisions did, however, in express terms, repeal all laws exempting property from taxation.

Lehigh Iron Co. v. Lower Macungie, 81 Pa. 482; Londonderry v. Berger, 2 Pearson, 230; Wagner Institute v. Philadelphia, 48 Legal Int. 36; & C. 1, Pa. C. C. R. 256.

It makes no difference that the exemption in our case did not, before the new Constitution, depend upon any statute. The Act of 1874 exempted school houses, court houses and jails. They are public property used for public purposes. If they were not previously liable, why was it necessary to pass an Act to exempt them?

Mr. Theo. A. Lamb, for defendant in error:

"Some things are always presumptively exempted from the operation of general tax laws, because it is reasonable to suppose they were not within the intent of the Legislature in adopting them. A State may, if the Legislature sees fit, tax all property owned by its municipal divisions; but to do so would render necessary new taxes to meet the demand of this tax, and thus the public would be taxing itself in order to raise money to pay over to itself; and no one would be benefited but the officers employed. It is always to be assumed that the general language of statutes is made use of with reference to taxable subjects; and the property of municipalities is not in any proper sense taxable. It is therefore, by clear implication, excluded. It is not, like government agencies, excluded from the power of tax laws, but it is beyond the grasp of their intent."

Cooley, Tax. pp. 130, 131; Directors of the Poor v. School Directors, 42 Pa. 21, 25; Louisville v. Commonwealth, 1 Duvall, 295, 296; People v. Solomon, 51 Ill. 87; State v. Gaffney, 3 N. J. L. 133; People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220, 222; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 614.

The public is never subject to tax laws and no portion of it can be, without express statute. No exemption law is needed for any public property held as such.

Directors of the Poor v. School Directors, 42 Pa. 25.

Counsel for the plaintiff concedes that prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1874, such was the law. But he contends that sections 1 and 2 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1874 have changed this.

As to the first section, this court decided in the case of Lehigh Iron Co. v. Lower Macungie Township, 81 Pa. 482, that it was not immediately operative, but required legislation to carry it into effect.

Section 2 provides that "All laws exempting property from taxation, other than the property above enumerated, shall be void."

Among the property above enumerated is public property used for public purposes; and therefore section 2 of this article did not avoid any law that exempted from taxation public property used for public purposes.

The Act of May 14, 1874 (P. L. 158), was intended to define what property shall be exempt from taxation and not to provide a method of taxation.

Coatesville Gas Co. v. Chester Co. 97 Pa. 476.

If that Act was intended to be anything more than an exemption Act, it would be unconstitutional, for article 3, section 3 of the Constitution of 1874, provides that "No bill, except general appropriation bills, shall be passed containing more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title.

The title to the Act in question does not contain the slightest reference to the bill being anything else than an exemption Act; and if it was intended to be a taxing Act, it is clearly unconstitutional because its title does not express the subject matter of the bill.

Union Pass. R. Co.'s App. 81* Pa. 91.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The property concerning which the present question arises is public property, used for public purposes. It belongs to a municipality. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1874 it undoubtedly was not subject to taxation. The reason for this rested in the character of its ownership rather than in the character of the property. It consists of a house and lot and some horses. Houses and lands and horses are taxable and have been so for a long time. But when these are held and used for the purpose of extinguishing fires and are owned by a city or borough, they become of a public character and they are used for public purposes.

In Poor Directors v. School Directors, 42 Pa. 21, we held that a county poor house is not taxable for school purposes and used the following language: "The public property is never subject to tax laws; and no portion of it can be, without express statute. No exemption law is needed for any public property held as such." To the same effect are Dill. Mun. Corp. 614; People v. Doe, 86 Cal 222; People v. Solomon, 51 Ill. 52; and Worcester v. Worcester, 116 Mass. 193.

In Cooley on Taxation 130, it is said: "It is always to be assumed that the general language of statutes is made up with reference to taxable subjects; and the property of municipalities is not in any proper sense taxable. It is therefore by clear implication excluded."

This being so the property in question was not taxable at the adoption of the Constitution of 1874. There is no legislation since that which makes it taxable. The Act of May 14, 1874 (P. L. 158), contains no provision subjecting such property to taxation. Unless, therefore, article 9, § 1 of the Constitution, changes the law and makes such property taxable it is not taxable at all, simply because there is no law making it so. The language of the section is as follows: "All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and shall be levied and collected under general laws; but the General Assembly may, by general laws, exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes, actual places of religious worship, places of burial not used or held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public charity."

This section does not declare that all property whether public or private shall be subject to taxation; nor does it contain any equivalent provision. It does, however, direct that "All taxes * * * shall be levied and collected under general laws." This certainly means that the legislative power of the Commonwealth shall provide the necessary legislation for levying and collecting all taxes.

In Lehigh Iron Co. v. Lower Macungie Township, 81 Pa. 482, and in Coatesville Gas Co. v. Chester Co. 97 Pa. 476, we held that these provisions of the Constitution do not execute themselves but were simply mandatory to the Legislature to enact laws to carry them into effect.

The provision of section 1, therefore, cannot operate to repeal any pre-existing law, exempting public property from taxation, because there was no such law. Such property was not taxable because there was no law which made it so. It was the absence, not the presence, of law which made it nontaxable. The new Constitution might have made it taxable but did not; and as the Legislature has failed to make it taxable, there is no law for its taxation and it is not taxable at all. It is true the Legislature of 1874 did exercise its power and exempt certain property which does not include this; but the fact still remains that it did not impose any taxation upon this and hence there is none.

Judgment affirmed.

Robert CORSON, Exr., Appt.,

v.

James GARNIER.

1. An insurable interest is not necessarily a definite pecuniary interest, such as is recognized and protected at law; it may be contingent, restricted as to time, or indeterminate in amount; but it must be actual, such as will reasonably justify a well grounded expectation of advantage, dependent upon the life of the insured, so that the purpose of the party effecting the insurance may be to secure that advantage, and not merely to put a wager upon human life.
2. A nephew has not, from mere relationship, an insurable interest in the life of his aunt.
3. If, at the time a policy of life insurance is issued, the insured is the debtor of the beneficiary and the policy is taken in good faith for the protection of the creditor, it is not necessary to prove a continuance of the relation of debtor and creditor until the maturity of the policy.
4. The same rule applies where the insurance company, admitting its liability, has paid the money into court, and the controversy is between the beneficiary and the personal representatives of the insured.
5. The insurance of the life of a debtor for the sum of $2,000 in favor of a creditor, where the amount of indebtedness was uncertain when insurance was effected, but afterwards ascertained to be between $500 and $750, held, under the facts of the case to be no evidence of bad faith, or that the contract was a wager.

6. In the absence of evidence that a policy on the life of a debtor, in favor of a creditor, is held in trust for the debtor, the presumption is against such trust and that the rights of the parties appear upon the face of the policy.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a decree of Common Pleas No. 4, of Philadelphia County, sustaining the appellee's exceptions to the master's report. Affirmed.

This was a bill in equity filed by Robert Corson, executor of Ellen McLean, deceased, against the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society of New York, and James Garnier, for the purpose of requiring Garnier to assign and surrender to Corson, as executor, a policy of insurance on the life of Ellen McLean, and compelling the Life Assurance Society to pay the amount of the policy, $2,000 to Corson as executor.

The Life Assurance Society paid the money into court and Garnier filed an answer. The case was then referred to a master who found the following facts:

James Garnier, the defendant, was a nephew of Ellen McLean, who, prior to the spring of 1880, lived with her two minor children at Lawrence, Massachusetts, where she was employed in a mill. At the instance of Mr. Garnier she came to Philadelphia with her children, he having sent her money for that purpose. After her arrival in this city Mr. Garnier bought a grocery at Tenth and Manilla Streets, fitted it up and stocked it at his own expense, and placed Mrs. McLean in charge; he replenished the stock from time to time, and Mrs. McLean paid him as she got money from the receipts of the store.

This store Mr. Garnier sold at a good price, and Mrs. McLean received the price. Thereafter Mr. Garnier bought another store for her on Fitzwater Street, and fitted it up in the same way, and subsequently sold it for Mrs. McLean's benefit. And thereafter another store was bought by Mr. Garnier on Fifth Street below Christian, and fitted up for Mrs. McLean, and the stock replenished from time to time by him. This store was also sold at a good profit and Mrs. McLean received the price.

The relationship between Mrs. McLean and Mr. Garnier was most intimate. He was her friend and adviser and, in the language of one of the witnesses, was more like a son to her than a nephew. At the instance of Samuel, the son of Mrs. McLean, she had her life insured in the Provident Savings and Life Assurance Society of New York, in two policies, one of them in her own favor and the other in favor of her nephew James Garnier. The latter policy was for $2,000, and neither it nor the application for it had any reference to any indebtedness from Mrs. McLean to Mr. Garnier, or that it was taken to secure any indebtedness.

In fact, the defendant Garnier in his answer (and his counsel on argument) disclaimed that it was taken out to secure an indebtedness, and avowed that there never had been a settlement between Mrs. McLean and Mr. Garnier and, from the nature of their intimacy, could not be; and stated to the master that if his right to the proceeds of the policy was not otherwise absolute, he would not and did not claim it by reason of any indebtedness.

The master recommended a decree reimbursing the defendant Garnier for the cost of the policy and subsequent premiums paid by him, with interest, and the payment of the balance of the fund to the plaintiff with costs.

To this report the defendant, Garnier, excepted, substantially on the ground that the master erred in finding that there was neither relationship nor pecuniary interest sufficient to give Garnier an insurable interest in the life of Ellen McLean.

The court below sustained all the exceptions save one, and awarded the sum in court to Garnier; the costs since the fund was ordered to be paid into court to be paid by the plaintiff, and the costs prior to that time to be paid out of said fund.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed, and assigned as error, inter alia, the action of the court in sustaining the defendant Garnier's exceptions, and awarding the fund to him.

Measrs. John Sparhawk and N. Du Bois Miller, for appellant:

Where the insurable interest arises or is implied from relationship, it will be deemed to exist when the relationship is such that the insurer has a legal claim upon the insured for services or for support; even though such legal claim does not exist, yet when (from the personal relations of the two and the kindness and good feeling displayed by the insured to the insurer) the latter has a reasonable right to expect some pecuniary advantage from the continuance of the life of the former, or to bear loss from his death, an insurable interest will be held to exist.

Rombach v. Piedmont etc. Ins. Co. 18 Ins. L. J. 268.

This is the reason recognized in this State for holding the insurance of a father's life by his son to be valid.

Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154.

A man has no insurable interest in the life of his brother per se; Lewis v. Phoenix Mut. Ins. Co. 89 Conn. 100; or in the life of his son.

Halford v. Kymer, 10 Barn. & Cress. 724.

In Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, however, the very relationship now under consideration was held to show no insurable interest.

It has been held that a man has not an insurable interest in the life of his brother, merely as such, although it would be different if he were dependent upon him for support. The same is true of a nephew's interest in the life of an uncle; and the same has been said of a husband in his wife's life.

Bliss, Ins. p. 83.

If, however, the relation of debtor and creditor subsists, and the policy is affected with the privity of the debtor, and it is agreed or can be inferred that it is intended as a security, it will belong to the debtor after payment of the debt; Crawley, Life Ins. 87; *Lea v. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 648 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 244).

The learned court below denied our right as executor to recover the proceeds of the policy in suit from the defendant, because the contract of the insurance company was made with Garnier, who paid the premium; and, therefore, the legal representatives of the insured who simply joined in the application have no interest in or right to the fund, which arises by virtue of no contract with the decedent. But this is not the law of this State.

Gilbert v. Moore's Exrs. 13 W. N. C. 489.

Messrs. J. H. Anders and William F. Johnson, for appellee:

An examination of the authorities touching the question of assignments of life policies to secure indebtedness, and the proper distribution of the proceeds on the happening of the event insured against, shows that there is no inflexible rule of construction; and that in each particular case it is a question of fact, to be determined by the evidence.

Being a creditor at the time of the issuance of the policy, Garnier's right to the proceeds is incontestable.

In all the decisions declaring policies void on the ground of public policy as wagers between certain relatives there is a constant qualification.

In Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, it is declared "mere relation of uncle and nephew do not constitute an insurable interest."

In Lewis v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 39 Conn. 100, that a man has no insurable interest in his brother, per se, or as Bliss says, p. 33: merely as such.

The "mere," "per se," "merely as such," is constant.

Any interest added saves the policy.

Where the relationship between the parties is such as to constitute a good and valid consideration in law for any gift or grant, the transaction is entirely free from the imputation of a wager policy.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

Although a policy of life insurance is not like a fire or marine policy, a mere contract of indemnity, but a contract to pay a certain sum of money in the event of death (Scott v. Dickson, 16 W. N. C. 181), yet the assured is not entitled to his action on the policy, unless he had, as the basis of his contract, an interest in the subject matter insured. This is a rule founded in public policy and is of general application. Ruse v. Mut. Benefit L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516.

If it were not so, the whole system of life insurance would become the mere cover for wicked speculation by wager in human life, and thus prove the occasion for the commission of the grossest crimes.

An insurable interest, however, is not necessarily a definite pecuniary interest, such as is recognized and protected at law; it may be contingent, restricted as to time, or indeterminate in amount; but it must be actual, such as will reasonably justify a well grounded expectation of advantage, dependent upon the life insured, so that the purpose of the party effecting the insurance may be to secure that advantage, and not merely to put a wager upon human life.

Therefore a wife has an insurable interest in the life of her husband, or the husband in the life of his wife. Baker v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. 43 N. Y. 288.

And a single woman, under contract to marry, in the life of her intended husband. Chisholm v. Nat. Capitol Life Co. 52 Mo. 218.

A parent has in like manner an insurable interest in the life of a child, and a child in the life of a parent. Loomis v. Eagle L. & H. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 396; Mitchell v. Union Life Ins. Co. 45 Me. 104; Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154.

In the case last cited this court says: "It would be technical in the extreme to say that a son has no insurable interest in his father's life. Poverty may overtake the father in his lifetime, and thus both father and mother be cast upon the son; or if the father die before her, the necessity may fall at once upon the son. Why, then, should he be not permitted to make a provision by insurance, to reimburse himself for his outlays, past or future? What injury is done to the insurance company? They receive the full premium and they know in such case, from the very relationship of the parties, that the contract is not a mere gambling adventure, but is founded in the best feelings of our nature, and on a legal duty which may arise at any time."

In Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115, a young unmarried female, without property, who for several years had been supported and educated at the expense of her brother, who stood to her in loco parentis, was held to have an insurable interest in his life.

So also, a creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor. American Life & H. Ins. Co. v. Robertshaw, 26 Pa. 189; Cunningham v. Smith's Exrs. 70 Pa. 450.

In Keystone Mut. Assn. v. Beaverson, 16 W. N. C. 138, the assured, an unmarried lady, lived with her brother, who supported or maintained her in his family, under circumstances tending to constitute the relation of debtor and creditor between them, and it was held that he had such an insurable interest in her life as would support a policy of insurance, taken out by him therein.

"This case" says the court, "was not submitted to the jury under a ruling that the mere fact of a person on whose life the policy was taken being a sister of the defendant in error, gave to the latter an insurable interest in her life, although reputable authorities have recognized such relationship to be sufficient. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 562 [Bk. 24, L. ed 288]. In the present case evidence was given that he was supporting and maintaining her in his family under circumstances tending to constitute the relation of debtor and creditor. It was under all the facts of the case that the court held he had an insurable interest in the life of his sister. It is very clear that the insurance was obtained in good faith and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which he had no interest. Scott v. Dickson, ante, p. 181. The policy in question shows the willingness of the company to take the risk on the ground of relationship alone."

The rule deducible from all the cases is thus stated in Warnock v. Daria, 104 U. S. 775 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 924], by Mr. Justice Field: "It is not easy to define with precision what will in all cases constitute an insurable interest so as to take the contract out of the class of wager policies. It may be stated generally, however, to be such an interest, arising from the relations of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor of or surety for the assured or from the ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life.

"It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation; for a parent has an insurable interest in the life of his child, and a child in the life of his parent; a husband in the life of his wife, and a wife in the life of her husband. The natural affection in cases of this kind is considered as more powerful, as operating more efficaciously to protect the life of the insured than any other consideration. But in all cases there must be a reasonable ground, founded upon the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured. Otherwise the contract is a mere wager, by which the party taking the policy is directly interested in the early death of the assured. Such policies have a tendency to create a desire for the event. They are, therefore, independently of any statute on the subject, condemned as being against public policy."

It cannot be pretended that Garnier had an insurable interest in the life of his aunt, by force of the mere relationship existing between them. No case has been brought to our notice which carries the rule to this extent. Between husband and wife, and parent and child, the relationship is so close and intimate and the mutual dependence and legal liability for support so manifest that nothing more is wanting to establish the insurable interest. Garnier, however, did not hold any such relation to Ellen McLean, either natural or assumed; he was simply her "friend and adviser." He was doubtless a valuable friend; he had advanced money to bring her to Philadelphia; he fitted up, stocked, and from time to time replenished the store at Tenth and Manilla Streets; having disposed of this for her benefit, he purchased the establishment on Fitzwater Street, and selling this, he bought for her a third, on Fifth Street, below Christian. She repaid Garnier, however, for his outlays in her behalf, from time to time, from the ordinary receipts of the several stores and from the proceeds of the sales.

The only relation existing between James Garnier and Ellen McLean, which could give Garnier an insurable interest in her life was that of debtor and creditor, and upon this ground alone the case must be considered.

It is not denied that at the date of the policy Mrs. McLean was indebted to Garnier, for money advanced and expended in her behalf, in some amount between $500 and $750. It is said, however, that Garnier in his answer disclaims as a creditor; that he places his right to the proceeds of the policy on other grounds, and makes no claim whatever by reason of any indebtedness. We do not so understand either the answer or the evidence given by the defendant in the case. The bill charges, in the first paragraph, in substance, that the policy was taken out and applied as a collateral security to the debt which Mrs. McLean then owed Garnier, and in the subsequent paragraphs that the debt having been fully paid in the lifetime of the assured the proceeds of the policy should pass into her estate. This fact is specifically denied; the defendant in his answer says it is "not true that the policy of insurance, referred to in paragraph 1 of the complainant's bill, was applied for and issued upon the life of Ellen McLean, for any such reason or purpose as therein stated."

It is undisputed, however, that at the issuing of the policy the relation of debtor and creditor did exist, and to the extent stated; the defendant having denied that the policy was taken as collateral security for that debt, a question of fact is thus raised to be determined by the evidence. Upon examination of the proofs, we find no evidence from which the fact might be fairly inferred. The insurance was not effected at the instance of Mrs. McLean, but at the suggestion of her son Samuel McClatchy, in whose name a second policy in $1,000 was at the same time issued; the premiums were paid and the policy maintained by Garnier; indeed there is not the slightest proof in support of the plaintiff's hypothesis that the policy was held in trust for the debtor; and in the absence of such proof, the presumption is that the rights of the parties appear upon the face of the policy. Cunningham v. Smith, 70 Pa. 450.

It has been said, however, on the authority of Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East, 72, that an insurance upon the life of a debtor, in behalf of a creditor, is in legal effect but a guaranty of the debt, and if the debt is paid, the insurance is at an end; but it is now settled that this case is not the law; it was directly drawn in question and was expressly overruled in Dalby v. India & L. L. Assurance Co. decided in the Exchequer Chamber, 15 C. B. 865.

The law seems to be well settled that it is wholly unnecessary to prove an insurable interest in the life of the assured, at the maturity of the policy, if it was valid at its inception; and in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the sum expressed on the face of the policy is the measure of recovery. Rawls v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 37 N. Y. 282; Murray v. Home Ins. Co. 9 R. I. 348; Hoyt v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. 3 Bosw. 440; Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 501].

The doctrine of all the cases to which our attention has been called is that if the policy was originally valid, it does not cease to be so by cessation of interest in the subject of insurance, unless such be the necessary effect of the provisions of the instrument itself.

Therefore, where a husband insured his life for the benefit of his wife and was subsequently divorced, it was held that, notwithstanding the relation of husband and wife no longer existed, and her insurable interest had thus ceased, yet she could recover the full amount of the policy. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 251].

"Supposing a fair and proper insurable interest of whatever kind" says the court in the case last cited "to exist at the time of taking out the policy, and that it be taken out in good faith, the object and purpose of the rule which condemns wager policies is sufficiently attained; and there is then no good reason why the contract should not be carried out according to its terms." To the same effect is McKee v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 28 Mo. 383.

All the cases to which we have referred, it is true, arose from suits brought upon the policies of insurance; but the same principles apply where the company, admitting its liability, has paid the money into court to abide the result, and the controversy is between the remaining parties.

In our own case of Scott v. Dickson, 16 W. N. C. 181, our brother Paxson, upon a review of the cases, concludes that where one has an insurable interest at the time an insurance is effected upon the life of another for his benefit, the fact that his interest ceases to exist, at or prior to the death of the insured, will not, as against the personal representatives of the insured, deprive him of the right to receive the insurance money; therefore it was held that a surety on an official bond has an insurable interest in the life of the obligor; and that his right to recover upon the policy was not affected by the fact that no breach of the condition of the bond had ever occurred.

But a merely colorable, temporary or disproportionate interest may present circumstances from which want of good faith, and an intent to evade the rule, may be inferred; therefore, although the relation of debtor and creditor may in general be said to establish an insurable interest, the amount of the insurance placed upon the life of the debtor cannot be grossly disproportionate to the benefit which might be reasonably supposed to accrue from the continuance of the debtor's life, without leaving the transaction open to the imputation of being a speculation or wager upon the hazard of a life. Wainwright v. Bland, 1 Moody & R. 481; Miller v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 2 E. D. Smith, 268.

The case of Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643

[82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 244], is exactly in point; the policy was taken out by Cammack, the creditor, upon the life of Lewis, his debtor, in the sum of $3,000; $2,000 for his own benefit and $1,000 for the benefit of Lewis. Lewis, in fact only owed Cammack $70, although he voluntarily and without consideration gave his obligation at the time for $3,000.

"If the transaction," says Mr. Justice Miller, "as set up by Cammack be true, then so far as he was concerned it was a sheer wagering policy and probably a fraud on the insurance company. To procure a policy for $3,000 to cover a debt of $70 is of itself a mere wager. The disproportion between the real interest of the creditor and the amount to be received by him deprives it of all pretense to be a bona fide effort to secure the debt; and the strength of this proposition is not diminished by the fact that Cammack was only to get $2,000 out of the $3,000; nor is it weakened by the fact that the policy was taken out in the name of Lewis and assigned by him to Cammack. This view of the subject receives confirmation from the note executed by Lewis to Cammack for the precise amount of the risk in the policy which, if Cammack's account be true, was without consideration and could only have been intended for some purpose of deception, probably to impose on the insurance company." See also Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 800].

In the case at bar, the policy was $2,000; the amount of the indebtedness was, at the time, undetermined and therefore uncertain. It has since been ascertained to have been between $500 and $750. Considering the character of their business relations, the unsettled condition of their affairs, the age of the subject of insurance, the probable amount of premiums which might accrue, the accumulation from interest, we could not say the transaction carries with it any inherent evidence of bad faith.

The essential thing is, as stated by the learned judge of the court below, that the policy should be obtained in good faith, and not for the purposes of speculation, upon the hazard of a life in which the insured has no interest.

The case is materially different from Gilbert v. Moose's Admrs. 13 W. N. C. 489. The principles involved in that case are not drawn in question here.

We find no error in the decree of the court below and it is therefore affirmed.

The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

CITY OF SCRANTON SCHOOL DISTRICT et al., Appls.,
v.

LACKAWANNA IRON & COAL CO.

1. An Act of Assembly which applies to those only of a class who accept its pro-

NOTE.—Governor Pattison, in vetoing the Act construed in the above case, said:

"The prohibition of section 7, article III, of the Constitution, against the passage of local or special laws regulating the affairs of counties, cities, towns visions, is not sustainable under the rule of classification, allowed by law, but is special legislation; and when the subject matter falls within the prohibition of the Constitution it is void.

2. The Act of March 18, 1875, regulating the assessment and collection of taxes in cities of the third class, which contains a proviso excluding from the operation of the Act all cities of the third class, etc.,

ships, wards, boroughs or school districts is absolute. The prohibition against local or special laws upon this subject includes the command that whenever laws relating thereto are passed, they shall be general in their application. Anything which defeats or limits their general application is obnoxious to the prohibition. If certain counties or cities cannot be specially legislated for by name, they cannot be thus legislated for by including them in an exception to a general law. The inhibition is against passing laws that will operate upon them alone, to the exclusion of others in the same general legal category.

Again, the fact whether a law is general or special is to be determined by the force of its operating words at the time of its passage, and cannot be made to depend upon the happening of any such contingency as the desire or action of the councils of a city or the act of a board of county commissioners. If the Legislature cannot give a particular county immunity from the operation of a general law, it cannot depute to the city or county the privilege of giving itself such immunity. The power denied to the superior body cannot be vested by it in the subordinate.

"Neither can the intentment of a broad constitutional provision be defeated by any mere juggle of words. If the law only recognizes cities of given classes, the Legislature cannot further divide those classes into those accepting and those not accepting legislation. Neither can such a division be set up as counties governed by special laws and those not governed by special laws. If this could be done, the whole purpose of the constitutional prohibition would be defeated. Some counties or cities in given classes would be governed by one law, and some by others. If the bills now objected to should be signed, the extent or generality of their application would be dependent entirely upon the willingness or unwillingness of certain counties or cities to be governed by them.

"Surely, this cannot be done and the purpose of the Constitution be defeated in such an indirect and specious manner. The tendency of this sort of legislation has become so great that I think it is time to assert rigidly the spirit and letter of the Constitution. It is true that many laws containing option clauses have been enacted in the past, and some may receive the sanction of the present Executive. The recurrence of this character of enactments, however, has become so frequent as to induce me to attempt to outroot the practice, if possible.

"In support of the line of argument I have adopted, I refer to the work of Mr. Buckalew on the Constitution, pp. 73, 74."

While class legislation is recognized and sustained in Pennsylvania, it is based upon the ground of necessity.

"Classification of cities, and laws confined thereto, are permissible only in matters relating to their municipal government, but the rights of persons and property must be secured by general laws, which must be uniform and in force everywhere throughout the State." Arnold, J., of Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County in Phila. v. Pepper, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 287.

The cases of City of Scranton v. Silkman, post 317; Wilkesbarre v. Meyers, post, 320; Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 394, and similar ones seem to be direct authority for this generalization.

Under the authority of Scranton v. Silkman, it may be a question if the provision to be found in many Acts of Assembly in Pennsylvania, saving special laws does not in like manner offend against the Constitution. Such is the view expressed by Governor Pattison, above. See also Com. v. Scheckler, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 505.

Some important Acts contain this provision, among others, the Act of May 23, 1881 (P. L. 45), providing for tax liens, etc.; the Act of June 29, 1881 (P. L. 128), to prevent fraud in primary elections; and the Act of June 25, 1885 (P. L. 187), regulating the collection of taxes in boroughs and townships.

The attempted classification, by option clause, condemned in the above case of Scranton School District's Appeal, is of frequent occurrence in the statute books of Pennsylvania. An extreme case under this head is where an Act, general in its terms, is limited to those counties accepting it by ballot. Acts of June 23, 1885 (P. L. 142), relating to fences, and June 12, 1878 (P. L. 198), relating to taxation of dogs and protection of sheep.

Such legislation has been upheld in other States as general legislation. See cases cited below.

Prior to the constitutional prohibition against special legislation, it would probably have been upheld under Locke's App. 72 Pa. 481.

Another option clause, of frequent occurrence, is the acceptance of the new Constitution. See the illustration used below where corporations formed under general laws are likened to cities accepting legislation.

Among limitations somewhat similar to those in the case of Strine v. Foltz, ante, 285, may be mentioned that of the Act of April 28, 1883, authorizing voluntary tribunals to adjust disputes between employers and employees in iron, steel, glass, textile fabrics and coal trades; Acts applying to anthracite coal mines, bituminous coal mines, etc. See Millet v. People of Illinois, 5 West. Rep. (Ill.) 155.

The decisions of the different States are not in unison, upon the question of local or special legislation.

An Act regulating the holding of elections and declaring the result thereof, in cities, villages and incorporated towns in this State," with a provision for submitting the question of its adoption to the votes of the electors in any city, village or town, was held to be a general and not a local law, in Illinois, (People v. Hoffman, 3 West. Rep. 523 (Ill.)), the Chief Justice and an associate Justice dissenting to so much of the opinion as holds that this law is not local.) This illustration is used in the opinion of the court: "When 'An Act concerning corporations for pecuniary profit' first became a law, it had nothing whatever to operate upon. Its provisions were suspended until some corporation was formed to call them into action. When the first company was organized under it, it was in force as to that alone. Upon the formation of the second, it was only operative as to two companies and no more. It was none the less a general law because the objects upon which it took effect came into being at different times and not all at once."

The general principle is thus stated: "Laws are general when every person who is brought within the relations and circumstances provided for is affected by the law," citing People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388; People v. Cooper, 83 Ill. 586.

"An Act to reorganize and consolidate cities of the first grade of the second class (Columbus), and to reduce the tax levy of said cities," was declared local legislation; not so much because the title contained the name of the City of Columbus, which was the only city of the first grade, second class, in the State, but because, by the terms of the Act, it could not in the future apply to any other city coming into that class, and because the legislative intent therefore was that the Act should apply to the City of Columbus alone. State of Ohio v. Pugh, 1 West. Rep. 36 (Ohio).

This case contains an elaborate discussion of class legislation, with a dissenting opinion.

See also the following cases on the general subject: State of Ohio v. Hawkins and State of Ohio v. Hudson, 3 West. Rep. 125, 159 (Ohio); McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 1 Cent. Rep. 111 (Pa.); Morrison v. Bachert (Pa.) 3 Cent. Rep. 117.

An Act creating the office of police judge in all cities of the second grade and third class, having at the last federal census a population of 16,512 and no more, is held to be special, designating one city, and not creating a class. State of Ohio v. Anderson, 3 West. Rep. 605 (Ohio).

An Act, which provides that "Justices of the peace in all cities in this State (Illinois) having a population of 100,000 or more shall have civil jurisdiction in all cases except landlord's summons cases, coextensive with the limits or boundary lines of such city, in the maximum amounts as now prescribed by the statute," held, not to be a special law. Clarkson v. Guernsey Furniture Co. 5 West. Rep. 89 (Mo.).

which do not accept, by ordinance, the provisions of the Act, offends against article III, § 7 of the Constitution of 1874, which prohibits the passage of any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPPEAL from a decree of the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County in favor of complainant, in a suit in equity to restrain the collection of taxes. Reversed.

The Lackawanna Iron & Coal Company was the owner of seventy-five acres of unimproved land in the City of Scranton, which was assessed as third class property for city purposes. The City of Scranton School District levied a tax of ten mills on the dollar for the year 1885, at a full rate, without regard to the classification; and a one half mill sinking fund tax at a full rate.

The Company, alleging that the levy should be a half rate, under the Act of March 18, 1875, applied for an injunction to restrain the School District and its treasurer, the defendants, from collecting the tax, at least as to one half thereof.

The Act of 1875 is entitled "A Supplement to an Act, Entitled 'An Act Dividing the Cities of this State into Three Classes, Regulating the Passage of Ordinances, Providing for Contracts for Supplies and Work for said Cities, Authorizing the Increase of Indebtedness and the Creation of a Sinking Fund to Redeem the Same, Defining and Punishing Certain Offenses in all of said Cities, and Providing for the Incorporation and Government of Cities of the Third Class,' approved May 23, 1874." It provides in section 1, that "In all cities of the third class, all real estate shall, for taxable purposes, be classified and arranged in three classes. * * * All taxes, whether for general or special purposes of such city * * * shall be assessed, levied and collected * * * upon property of the third class, a one half rate."

It is provided in section 5 that "No city of the third class, nor any city of less population than 10,000 inhabitants, heretofore incorporated, shall become subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act until the same are accepted by an ordinance, etc."

The City of Scranton was incorporated April 23, 1866; and on May 23, 1873, had a population of more than 10,000, and less than 100,000 inhabitants. On March 16, 1877, an ordinance was passed by councils and approved by the mayor, the title of which referred to the Act of May 23, 1874; but in section 1 it provided for the acceptance by the City of the Act of May 23, 1874, and the supplements thereto. Letters patent were duly issued by the Governor.

The court, McCollum, P. J., specially presiding, granted a preliminary injunction, which on motion was continued. On appeal, the decree was reversed and the injunction dissolved, November 2, 1885, the supreme court saying, in a per curiam opinion: "We think the constitutionality of the Act of March 18, 1875, is too doubtful to permit this preliminary injunction to stand" [1 Cent. Rep. 627.]

The matter was then referred, on bill and answer, to Henry A. Knapp as master, and examined;

he reported the following conclusions of law:

1. The Act of Assembly of March 18, 1875 (P. L. 15), has no application to school taxes.

2. The first five sections of the Act of 1875 are in violation of article III, § 8 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, which prohibits the General Assembly from passing any local or special laws regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts.

3. The ordinance of the City of Scranton, approved March 16, 1877, and the certificate of the Governor issued in pursuance thereof, constituted a sufficient and lawful adoption of the Act of March 18, 1875, by the said City of Scranton.

4. Recommending that the bill should be dismissed.

The plaintiff filed exceptions to the first, second and fourth, and the defendants excepted to the third conclusion of the master. The court dismissed the defendants' exception, and sustained the exceptions of the plaintiff, and made the injunction permanent. The defendants then took this writ.

The assignments of error were to the action of the court in dismissing the defendants' exception, and in sustaining the plaintiff's exceptions, and in decreeing a permanent injunction.

Messrs. Fred. W. Gunster and Chas. H. Welles, for appellants:

The first five sections of the Act of March 18, 1875, are in violation of the constitutional restrictions as to special legislation.

Art. III, § 7, Const. 1874.

By the terms of the proviso contained in section 5, the Act is applicable to only a portion and not all of the cities of the third class. The proviso subdivides cities into those already incorporated and those which may be incorporated after its date; and if some of the cities accept the provisions of the Act there will be a further subdivision.

The Legislature having classified cities by the Act of 1874, cannot make subclasses by excepting a portion of any one class, by reference to the date of their incorporation, from the operation of a law passed for the class.

The proviso leaves it optional with each city whether or not it will become subject to the law. If such legislation be sustained, any city may get such particular laws as it wishes, without interfering with other cities, by simply tacking on a proviso like the one in question, and then passing the ordinance.

No classification of school districts has as yet been attempted; and until they are classified any Act affecting them must affect all or none.

Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Scowden's App. 96 Pa. 422; Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 877; McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 1 Cent. Rep. 111.

Nowhere in the title of the Act in question is there the remotest reference, express or implied, to schools, school districts or school taxes. Certainly no such ideas as these words suggest are clearly expressed in the title. The Act is, therefore, unconstitutional.

Art. III, § 8, Const. 1874.

The proviso is a virtual delegation of the legislative power, and therefore in violation of the Constitution, vesting the legislative power in the Senate and House of Representatives.

Art. II, § 1, Const. 1874.

Until the ordinance is passed, the Act as a statute has no existence. It left the balls of legislation imperfect and unfinished, for it lacked the qualities of command and prohibition absolutely essential to every law.

Parker v. Commonwealth, 6 Pa. 507; Locke's App. 72 Pa. 491.

Again; the Act of 1874, relating to cities, is a general law. The tax provisions of the Acts of 1875 and 1874 cannot stand together; and whenever any city of the third class accepts the Act of 1875, so much of the Act of 1874 as conflicts therewith is repealed as to that city. By force of its own provisions the Act of 1875 (first five sections) becomes a partial repeal of the general law of 1874 and is local, applying only to the city which accepts it.

This is a violation of the provision of the Constitution, prohibiting the enactment of local laws by the partial repeal of general laws.

Art. III, § 7, Const. 1874.

Messrs. Willard & Warren, for appellee: In Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338, and Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401, this court decided that the just classification provided for in the Act of May 23, 1874, offended against no provision of the Constitution.

The Act of 1874, so far as it relates to cities of the third class, § 57, contains a proviso similar to that of the Act of 1875. If this court holds that the Act of March 18, 1875, is unconstitutional, on account of the proviso, then all of the Act of 1874 relative to third class cities is, for the same reason, unconstitutional; and third class cities of the Commonwealth have been conducting their municipal affairs for ten years past without authority of law.

The object of the provisos in the Acts of 1874 and 1875, was to preserve to such cities of the third class as saw fit to retain their old charters such laws as experience had proved were adapted to their wants.

Commonwealth v. Halstead, 1 Pa. C. C. R.; S. C. 2 C. P. R. 247.

The Act in question, when it received the approval of the Governor of the Commonwealth, became a perfect law. It is not an invitation—it needs no ratification—it is not a delegation of legislative power, and lacks none of the qualities of command and prohibition essential to every law.

The Act of 1875 is a supplement to the Act of 1874; and the proviso therein was absolutely necessary in order to further the principle adopted in the fifty-seventh section of the Act of 1874. The purpose was to preserve the rights of cities not accepting, and the effect was to create uniformity of charters.

"The principle which allows a corporation, whose charter is in a sense a contract, to accept an Act of the Legislature, is very different from that which prohibits the people from voting a law into existence, when, under the fundamental law, they have delegated the law-making power to a body of representatives. It has been held in the latter case that such a law is unconstitutional, but we apprehend never in the former case."

Per Hand, P. J. in Com. v. Halstead, 2 C. P. R. 247; S. C. 1 Pa. C. C. R. 335.

"Nothing but a clear violation of the Constitution, a clear usurpation of the powers prohibited, will justify the courts in pronouncing an Act of the Legislature unconstitutional and void."

Speer v. School Directors, 50 Pa. 150; Sharpless v. Mayor, 21 Pa. 164; Hilbish v. Catherman, 64 Pa. 154; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Riblet, 66 Pa. 164; Commonwealth v. Butler, 11 W. N. C. 241.

All the presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of an Act of Assembly.

Craig v. First Presbyterian Church, 88 Pa. 42.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in this case claims the benefit of the provision of the first section of the Act of March 18, 1875 (P. L. 15), which directs that in cities of the third class, for purposes of taxation, all real estate and the improvements thereon shall be classified and arranged in three classes, upon which different rates of assessment shall be imposed. The rate claimed by the plaintiff is less than the full rate levied upon the adjusted valuation made for city purposes, upon which the defendant has caused the school tax to be assessed.

The proviso to the fifth section of the Act of March 18, 1875, excludes from the operation of the Act all cities of the third class, and all cities containing less than 10,000 population, previously incorporated, which do not accept, by an ordinance duly passed, the provisions of the Act.

According to this all cities that do accept will be subject to the methods of assessment and collection prescribed by the first five sections, and all that do not will not be so subject; and as to them, different methods will prevail. Whether the methods prescribed by the Act shall be the law will depend, not upon the terms of the legislation but upon the will of others who are not law makers at all; and what may be the law in one city of the third class may not be the law in another city of the same class. In other words, a majority of the members of the city councils of any one city of the third class may impose upon the inhabitants of that city a method of taxation which may not prevail in any other city of the Commonwealth.

A law which authorizes this to be done is, in our judgment, clearly obnoxious to the seventh section of the third article of the Constitution, which prohibits the General Assembly from passing any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts. The circumstance that the power to determine the question is delegated to another body does not at all affect the question. The practical result is the same; the Law of 1875 will be limited to the one or more cities that do accept, and that makes it local. All our recent decisions are to the effect that if local results either are or may be produced by a piece of legislation, it offends against this provision of the Constitution and is void. Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258; Scowden's App. 96 Pa. 422; Davis v. Clark, 15

W. N. C. 209; McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 16 W. N. C. 497; [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 111.]

In the first of these cases the method employed was to limit the application of an Act which ostensibly embraced "all counties," by a geographical description which confined it to one. In the next case the attempt was made to produce the same result by describing two concurrent populations of county and city, of such figures as to confine the operations of the Act practically to but one county, and it was condemned for the same reason. In the last two of the cases named, the objectionable limitation restrained the operation of the Act to counties of prescribed populations; and in both cases the legislation was condemned because it embraced less than the whole of the counties of the State.

In Davis v. Clark, the present Chief Justice said: "It was not then a general Act applicable to every part of the Commonwealth. It did apply to a great number of counties; but there is no dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be either one or the other. If it apply to the whole State it is general. If to a part only, it is local. As a legal principle it is as effectually local when it applies to sixty-five counties out of the sixty-seven as if it applied to one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the Act makes it local."

'We see no difference in principle between the foregoing cases and the present. It is the duty of the courts to enforce the Constitution as they find it. Attempts in covert modes to defeat its plain provisions must be set aside, with the same certainty as when the methods are open. Even if the intention be innocent and yet the legislation comes within the constitutional prohibitions, it must not be tolerated. We are of opinion that the second conclusion of law found by the master should have been sustained and the bill dismissed. The other matters discussed do not require consideration.

Decree reversed and plaintiff's bill dismissed, at the cost of the appellee.

v.

Frank N. HALSTEAD.

The first five sections of the Act of March 18, 1875, are unconstitutional, under article III, § 3 of the Constitution. (Scranton School District's Appeal, ante, 811.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment for defendant in an action of quo warranto. Reversed.

Reported below in 1 Pa. C. C. R. 335.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court below, as follows:

HAND, P. J.:

This is the case of a writ of quo warranto issued to test the title of Frank N. Halstead to the office of assessor of the sixteenth ward of the City of Scranton, a city of the third class. The information alleges that since the second day of April, 1883, the defendant has intruded into the office of assessor of taxes of the sixteenth ward of Scranton, without having been legally elected and appointed thereto; that Nathaniel Halstead was duly elected and appointed to the said office on the 20th day of February, A. D. 1883.

The answer of the defendant alleges that he was duly and legally appointed assessor to assess property for city purposes only, under the statute in such cases made and provided, to wit: Act of March 18, 1875, P. L. 15, which said statute was duly accepted and adopted by the city councils of the City of Scranton, by an ordinance duly passed by a majority of the members elected to each branch thereof voting in favor of the same, and approved by the mayor upon the 16th day of March, 1877, being appointed assessor as aforesaid, by the judges of the court of common pleas of said county, on the 20th of March, A. D. 1884; which office he accepted and has exercised and continues to exercise.

To the plea and answer the plaintiff joins issue in the nature of a demurrer, admitting the facts and alleging that they are not sufficient in law, because the Act of Assembly of March 18, A. D. 1875, P. L. 15, is unconstitutional and in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The issue is joined on this sole question of the constitutionality of the Act of March 18, 1875, a supplement to the Act of 1874, dividing cities into three classes.

The clauses of the constitution which it is claimed are violated by the Act of 1875 are:

Article III, section 6, relating to amendments.

Article IX, section 1, relating to uniformity of taxation.

Article III, sections relating to local and special legislation, as specified under that article.

We can only briefly state our views in regard to the questions raised, and must base them rather upon general and recognized principles of constitutional law than upon the analogy of particular cases found among the decisions of our higher courts. While the demurrer places this issue upon the unconstitutionality of the whole Act of Assembly, it would be only necessary to inquire as to the validity of the appointment of assessors by the court, upon the application of the councils as provided for in the first section of the Act of 1875.

Under article XII, section 1, we have no doubt of the power of the Legislature to vest, in their wisdom, the appointing of the assessors of cities for taxation for city purposes in the judges of the courts of common pleas. We remark in this connection, to be further dwelt upon, that the Act of 1875 applies to all cities of the third class to the same extent that the Act of 1874 does, and specifically to all cities of the third class, subject only to their acceptance.

The objection which seeks to break down the whole of the Act of 1875 (that it violates section 6, article III of the Constitution, in that it is amendatory of the Act of 1874 and, therefore, improperly drawn, because the Act of 1874 is not re-enacted and published at length) is not well taken. Simply because a law, properly expressed by title as a supplement to an Act, the title of which is fully set forth, by construction is incidentally amendatory of the previous Act, or even necessarily so when germane to the whole subject-matter, is therefore within the provisions of the sixth section, article III, would be a construction which would create a greater evil than that section was sought to remedy. All supplements are more or less amendatory. It was never intended that because an Act had this character, it must necessarily include all verbiage of previous legislation within its language. The object of the section was to give a clear idea to legislators and citizens of what was intended as law; and to prevent the covering up of a design by reference to title only.

We come next to the question: Is the Act of 1875 prohibited special legislation?

It is argued that it is an attempt to subclassify cities so as to reach forbidden legislation by indirection. The allegation is that the proviso of the fifth section works this apprehended evil, in that it makes three classes of cities, viz.: those which adopt the Act, those which do not, and those which are chartered subsequently. It is erroneous to call it three classes; it is only two, those which are under the Act and those which are not. If this be an evil, it is one which can hardly be avoided by legislation or Constitution, except in a new territory, not blessed with years of civilization.

It is urged that because a city, by its constituted authorities, has the option to accept the amendment to its charter, the vice is allowed to come in. We apprehend, however, that this conclusion is neither logical, honorable to the present Constitution, nor wise, in view of the history which precedes this legislation. A few plain general statements will show this. The right of cities to their charters and their specific vested rights has always been held by laws and Constitutions to be sacred. Some of the severest struggles in history have been prolonged to secure this right. Our present Constitution in many ways recognizes this, even in the case of private corporations. A careful effort to avoid interference with acquired rights is apparent. When the Constitution of 1874 was adopted there was an effort, it is true, to create uniformity and generality of legislation, and to sweep away, so far as possible, the evils of special legislation. In so far as this was to affect the future of the cities not then in being, it was no doubt wise; it may be also wise that it should, as far as possible, tend to make uniform the charters then in existence; but that it was wise or intended to strip from the cities, without their consent, valued rights, or to impose upon them even benefits, which the Legislature deemed such, without their consent, is not to be considered.

The City of Scranton with others came into existence under a granted charter many years before the present Constitution and the legislation thereunder. Very wisely did the framers of the Act of 1874 provide for a preservation of all vested rights, with an invitation to come under the provisions of the Act of 1874, in the fifty-seventh section of that Act. P. L. 1874, p. 260.

This section, we apprehend, does more to create uniformity of charters, or fundamental law regulating cities, than any system of forced legislation imposed upon cities could have done. What was the problem presented to the Legislature in regard to uniformity of law relating to cities? We are speaking now of full corporations, granted charters and rights, not of mere municipal divisions of territory, as towns and counties. The problem was a class of cities already in existence, with varied charters, special legislation to the full extent, by some considered not an unmixed evil, by the cities themselves considered a legal and vested privilege.

Was it to be supposed that our people were so forgetful of rights secured by law that they would attempt to force the old cities of the Commonwealth to dress themselves up in the habiliments of the new era of things? We apprehend that the Act of 1874 shows a different view of their duty. They preserved all of the old to which it rightfully belonged, by a provision that "The acceptance shall not be construed to be a repeal or surrender of rights, powers, privileges and franchises heretofore by law conferred on such city, etc." This was a guaranty to all the old cities against vandalism and wanton disregard of privilege and right.

Then follows the Act of 1875, preserving the same jealous care of rights valued by long experience in self government, and providing for new privileges. Having adopted the principle in the Act of 1874, which we have found to be wise and necessary, the same option must be given in the Act of 1875, if beyond a peradventure vested chartered rights were not to be interfered with; hence, the condition that it must be accepted by the corporation. By this means it is plain that the tendency is increased toward uniformity of legislation.

The proviso in the Act of 1875, applying to cities before incorporated, was an absolute necessity in order to preserve franchises and to further the principle adopted in the Act of 1874.

It is to be remarked that the principle which allows a corporation, whose charter is in a sense a contract, to accept of an Act of the Legislature is very different from that which prohibits the people from voting a law into existence when, under the fundamental law, they have delegated the law-making power to a body of representatives. It has been held in the latter case that such a law is unconstitutional, but we apprehend never in the former case.

The only remaining question is that which relates to article IX, section 1, regarding uniformity of taxation. It is urged that the division of the rate upon the three classes of property into a full rate, a two-third rate and a half rate, conflicts with this section; also the division of property into the three classes does the same thing. After careful consideration we are unable to discover any wanton exercise of power by the Legislature in this behalf. The language of the Constitution is "uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax."

It will not be urged that the Legislature cannot fix the class of subjects. It must do this. The Constitution cannot do it. The Legislature has always done it. A reference to the tax laws shows this. Where is the prohibition that has taken this power from the sovereign power of the Commonwealth? If it can classify, then it may fix the rate, provided it makes it uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, to wit: within the county, the city, the borough, or the township.

But it may be urged that the Legislature cannot refine so much upon the classification as to destroy this provision of the fundamental law. This is true. It has been already held that the classification of cities is proper. The classification under the Act of 1875 is also proper. It is founded in experience, in natural necessity and in an equal distribution of burdens. We are dealing with incorporated cities, which require special provisions for health, police regulation, safety, and public convenience.

The great source of expense to a city is found in the first classification of real estate; the second source of expense in the second class; and the third source of expense in the third class. The classification is not refined, but natural, scientific, and we might almost say legal; for our courts, without legislation, have recognized the distinction between "rural" property in a city and improved property, where assessment by the front foot is attempted for local improvements. Whether, therefore, we look at it as a question of power or propriety, we reach the same conclusion. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the Act of 1875 is not unconstitutional but within the powers not taken from the Legislature.

We have said nothing thus far in regard to the merits of this legislation. If our views are correct, so far as uniformity of taxation is concerned, the Act of 1875 is in exact compliance with the letter of the Constitution. It fixes the classes of property and makes the tax uniform on these classes.

It would be useless to try to force city taxation down to the same uniformity as county and township taxation. It never will come to that, from the necessity of the case, the objects to be attained and the values being entirely different.

We look upon the legislation in the Acts of 1874 and 1875, relating to cities, as an honest and wise attempt to benefit cities, and to adopt principles in conformity to the Constitution which will actually, in experience, equalize the burdens of taxation. The Constitution, of itself, created two classes of cities, viz.: those existing with special privileges and those to come under the general laws for the first time in the history of the Commonwealth. There exist only these two classes now.

The Acts of 1874 and 1875 have been adopted by cities of the State. The City of Scranton in good faith adopted both at the same time, and for eight years taxes have been assessed under their provisions. They are proved to be beneficial. To declare the Act of 1875 now unconstitutional would work confusion, harm and only evil. It cannot be done without the clearest conflict with the letter of the Constitution. If it is in doubt it must stand. The classification is in the power of the Legislature; the rated tax is in accordance with the ability of the respective classes to pay, as well as in accordance with the burdens created by them.

If an instance was needed of the beneficial effects of the Acts of 1874 and 1875 in the small amount of corporate indebtedness, in the relatively low rate of taxation, and in the acquiescence of those who have the burdens of taxation, the City of Scranton presents that instance. The spirit of our present Constitution is to prevent the increase of both bonded indebtedness and the rate of taxation, and the Acts of 1874 and 1875 have tended to and produced this result. In fact the only cry which is heard is that the power does not exist to work out a contrary result, except by a vote of the people as now provided by law. The appointment of assessors has been made by this court on the nomination of councils from year to year, and the only object sought has been judicious officers, who would be capable, so far as possible, of making an equalized assessment. We discover no prohibition which avoids this legislative provision. It gives the people an opportunity to know who is to be appointed, with an opportunity to be heard.

Upon principles which we are constrained to recognize, we cannot set aside the expressed will of the Legislature as found in the Act of 1875. It has become part of the system regulating cities of the third class, and is not clearly nor by strong implication offensive to the fundamental law.

It is therefore adjudged that the defendant have and retain his office as assessor, and judgment is entered in his favor, with costs.

Mr. Horatio N. Patrick, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. I. H. Burns, Joseph O'Brien and Wendell MacLay, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent in this case claims title to his office by virtue of an appointment as assessor of taxes in the sixteenth ward of the City of Scranton, made by the Court of Common Pleas of Lackawanna County. The appointment was made under the authority conferred by the first section of the Act of March 18, 1875, P. L. 15.

The question of the validity of the first five sections of that Act came before us in the case of Appeal of Scranton School District [ante, 811] at the present term. We there held, in an opinion just filed, that those sections of the Act were contrary to the provisions of article III, section 7 of the Constitution, and therefore void. It follows that the judgment of the court below must be reversed and judgment of ouster entered against the defendant, on the demurrer.

Judgment reversed and judgment of ouster entered against the defendant and that he pay all the costs of the proceeding.

CITY OF SCRANTON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Catharine SILKMAN.

1. A statute is local legislation which applies to all the counties of the State except one, although that one is regulated by a local law on the same subject.
2. The Act of May 24, 1878, giving the right of appeal, from assessments for purposes of taxation, to owners of real estate in counties of less than 500,000 inhabitants, is unconstitutional under article VII, § 3 of the Constitution, prohibiting the passage of local or special laws regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts. (Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 384, applied.)

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment for plaintiff. Reversed.

Reported below in 1 Pa. C. C. R. 329.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court below, as follows:

HAND, P. J.—This is an appeal from the assessment of city taxes for the year 1883 and the decision of the board of appeal and revision. It is taken under the provisions of an Act of Assembly entitled "An Act Authorizing Appeals from Assessments in this Commonwealth to the Court of Common Pleas," approved April 20, 1876, P. L. 44, and the supplement thereto approved May 24, 1878, P. L. 132.

PA.

To this appeal the City of Scranton filed the plea that this court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter of this case because the Act of 1878, under which the appeal is taken, is unconstitutional and void, for the reason that it is special legislation prohibited by the Constitution.

The plaintiff joined issue upon the above plea. Upon this issue it was agreed in writing that if the court concluded to take jurisdiction of the case, the amount of reduction asked for and agreed to by defendant is $1,004, being the amount separately assessed for coal on third class land, the surface of which was assessed separately against the plaintiff. It was further agreed, for the purpose of considering the constitutionality of the Act of May 24, 1878, that the Act of March 18, 1875, P. L. 15, was accepted by the City of Scranton and all other cities of the Commonwealth except Lancaster, Allegheny and Wilkesbarre, prior to 1878; and that the last named cities have not accepted the provisions of the Act of May 24, 1874, nor of March, 1875, relating to the classification of cities, etc.

The sole question for our consideration is the constitutionality of the Acts of 1878 and 1875. These Acts are attacked upon the ground of their being special legislation within the prohibition of article III, section 7, as being Acts "regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts."

It is urged that this question is settled by the decision of Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 384, and by the decision of Judge Galbraith, in Railway Company's Appeal from decisions of Commissioners of Erie County, 16 Pitts. Legal J. 191.

The decision of the present question differs materially from that in Davis v. Clark, which involved an Act of Assembly directly in violation of the letter of the Constitution. That was a case relating to the creation of liens. It was the creation of a new lien and was, as the supreme court says, "special in its terms and local in its effect." It needed no construction to bring that Act of Assembly within the first clause of section 7, article III.

An examination of the Acts now under consideration will show their relations to the Constitution to be entirely different. The late day of argument of this case, and the short time allowed us in its decision, preclude as full an expression of our views as the importance of the question involves, and we desire. An early disposition of the question is sought because this is the triennial year of assessment. Our examination has led us to the following conclusions:

1. (a) The Act of 1878, in providing that it should apply to counties of less than 500,000 inhabitants, adopted a classification based upon population which has already been sustained by the supreme court as a proper classification on the part of the Legislature. (b) It is a classification not only proper, but one which the history of legislation for over a century rendered necessary in so far as it applies at present to but one city, and that Philadelphia. While it is based upon population, the necessities of the City of Philadelphia, as shown in the history of legislation, constitute a fact which justifies such a classification.

2. The Act of 1878, and its supplement, is not local nor special legislation within the meaning of the Constitution. Legislation may be denominated general in the sense of not being local nor special for various reasons. The clause against special legislation sought to remedy and prevent an evil. The Act of 1878 made that general law which before was special. A law may be judged as well by the results produced and the effect of the law, which means its aim, as by its language. The City of Philadelphia had its legislation allowing appeals to the common pleas long before the present Constitution. The Act of 1878 makes this valuable privilege coextensive with the State. In fact it gives the privilege to every "owner of real estate in this Commonwealth" on real estate in the counties outside of Philadelphia, and of course covers all owners residing in Philadelphia.

3. The Act of 1878 is not an Act regulating the affairs of counties. The matter of taxation, in all its branches, is pre-eminently a state affair. The power is a sovereign power. The subject matter of assessment, the levying and collecting of taxes, is wholly within the power of the State. It is the internal administration and management of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts that is aimed at in "the regulation of these affairs;" not the sovereign power and regulation of taxation with all its vital governmental concomitants.

4. The supplement of 1878 to the Act of 1876 is general, in that it applies to all the cities of the third class. It is possible a city may exist that cannot from some cause avail itself at present of its provisions. That does not, however, make a law special or local which in its terms is general.

The propositions above stated we believe are sustained by authority and a careful examination of the Acts in question.

The classification which separates, for the time being, the City of Philadelphia, is sustained by the case of Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 350.

In that case the court says: "A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law; while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special." A classification for the purposes of taxation is pre-eminently proper; and this may be made upon the basis of population, although it includes in one class the whole of the State, except one county, and puts that county in another class. Especially is this proper where that county embraces the largest city in the State, coextensive with the county, and differing in many respects from all the other cities and counties of the Commonwealth. To what extent this difference reaches may be discovered from the language of Judge Paxson on page 350 in the case cited.

In regard to the character of previous legislation relating to Philadelphia, we shall have something further to say. It is to be remarked that this is not a geographical classification in the Acts of 1876 and 1878; it is one based wholly on population. Undoubtedly a fact which moved the Legislature to adopt a maximum of population which excluded the rest of the State and included Philadelphia was the previous legislation on this same subject matter; but that is immaterial, provided she could keep her legislation general within her power of classification.

In Philadelphia it would appear that assessors are elected. Purdon, vol. 2, p. 1599, pl. 115.

In 1865 a board of revision was created with the right of appeal to the court of common pleas. Purdon, 1865, pl. 135.

By the Act of April 2, 1867, supplemental to Act of 1865 (Purdon, 1865, pl. 145-147) full provision is made for the assessment and collection of taxes for the City and County of Philadelphia. Is it possible that the Legislature may not, upon the subject of taxation, recognize this state of things in the largest county of the Commonwealth in providing for general legislation which covers the rest of the State? Must the Legislature and the rest of the State be handicapped by a technical construction of the Constitution which would create an evil worse than that sought to be remedied?

Again; we say the subject matter of this legislation is not the regulation of the affairs of counties. We are not disposed to place too technical a meaning upon the word "affairs." We are disposed to view the expression "regulating the affairs of counties, townships, etc." as that internal government of these subdivisions of the State which should be left to themselves and which consistent with the safety of the State at large may be so regulated by general laws without special interference. It is said by some writers that "affairs" relates to the business of the county. It is enough for the present comprehensive view that it should include all that may safely be given to the counties by general laws and not retained within the special control of the Legislature, the sovereign power, for the public good.

The power of taxation is a sovereign power. No limitation is placed by the Constitution on this power except that taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority laying the tax; a limitation which may require in order that they may be levied and collected under general laws, more or less of special legislation. No express power is given by the Constitution to the Legislature, upon the subject of taxation; that power is sovereign. Every utterance is an emphatic expression of the most unlimited power in the Legislature to tax; it is restricted in its powers of exemption (III. 7, IX. 2) and it may not surrender this power (IX. 3).

The fact that taxation is necessarily associated with the affairs of the county, or is an affair indirectly in which the county is interested, cannot affect the principle involved. The Legislature must necessarily keep the power of taxation wholly within its own control.

Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, page 518, says: "Whether in any case a charter of incorporation could be held void, on the ground that it conferred unlimited power of taxation, is a question that could not well arise, as a charter is never granted which does not impose some restriction."

He also says: "It is as true of the political divisions of the State as it is of the State at large, that legislative authority must be shown for every levy of taxes. The power to levy taxes by these divisions comes from the State." See also Burroughs on Taxation, §§ 2, 4.

It has always been an underlying principle in Pennsylvania, not only that taxes can only be voted by the people's representatives, but that, so far as possible, the machinery of taxation should be carried on by the people themselves, either by an active participation in the assessment of the same or by a tacit acquiescence. The enforcement of these principles is under the supervision of the State.

We believe the two Acts of Assembly in question in this case are the only instances in which the Legislature has given to every owner of real estate in this Commonwealth the full power by appeal to actively or tacitly acquiesce in the assessment of his property. It has been a source of complaint that non-resident taxpayers have not had a full opportunity of appealing free from local prejudice. This Act now gives to them this right. To belittle this right by calling it an affair of the county when it is the sovereign Act of the Legislature on a subject wholly within its control, and which in its scope is far-reaching for public good and for the honor of the State at large, we think is too technical. With this power of appeal, the taxpayer either tacitly or actively acquiesces in the result of his assessment. The county is the mere instrument or channel through which the sovereignty of the State flows. It is seldom that the State exercises her power to assess taxes directly. It chooses to exercise it upon the county directly, but it is no less the power of the State and of the State alone, which is felt and exercised, even though it be to provide for local government by local taxation.

In the instances in which the court has held that this clause of the Constitution has been violated, we are confident it will be found that it was where the internal business of the county, properly within her own control, was interfered with. As an example we refer to Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125.

Again; in so far as the Act of 1878, comprehending in it the Act of 1876, relates to cities of the third class, we apprehend that upon the face of the Act it applies to all cities of the third class. If it does, it is general. Upon this point, as also upon the whole question involved in the Act of 1876, we cite Cooley's Limitations, * 129, note, foot 142, and cases there cited.

Because some cities have not accepted the Act of 1875 and have no board of appeal and revision cannot affect the generality of the Act in itself. A fact in pais outside of legislation may or may not be recognized by the Legislature.

Another principle is involved in this subject matter of general as opposed to special legislation, which we have referred to in the case decided by us at this time, involving the constitutionality of the Act of 1875 relating to cities. It is a question which affects or may affect all the old cities of the State, but especially the City of Philadelphia, because it is the oldest and largest.

It may be conceded that the charter of a municipal corporation is not a contract in the sense that the Legislature may not repeal it or any portion of it. But the question is whether, under the impulse and restraint that is upon the Legislature to provide general legislation, such general legislation, without any clear expressed intention to repeal any part of a city charter granted before the new Constitution, can be allowed to have that effect. May not the Legislature, in order to prevent a catastrophe, apprehended or real, exclude a city like Philadelphia from such legislation, which would be general without such exclusion? In the present case we have held that it may make that general which before was special, without repealing the special legislation. This involves to some degree the power of classification in order to exercise the power. The principles enunciated in Dart v. Clark do not militate against this view when the subject matter of the legislation is general.

From the foregoing considerations we have been compelled to differ with the learned Judge who decided the case in Erie County. We believe the legislation in question is not special or local, because it provides an appeal for "all owners of real estate in this Commonwealth;" because its subject matter, taxation, is of necessity general; and because it in its effect provides a right of appeal to the common pleas over the whole Commonwealth, which before existed over only a part thereof.

We also remark that this legislation does not affect the "levying and collecting" of taxes; it only provides an appeal from the decision of Commissioners or Board of Revision and Appeal. We therefore entertain this appeal and, in accordance with the facts agreed upon, reduce the assessment $1,004.

The defendant then took this writ.

The assignments of error were to the action of the court: 1, in taking jurisdiction and overruling defendant's plea; 2, in holding the Act of May 24, 1878, to be constitutional; and 3, in entering a decree in favor of plaintiff.

Messrs. I. H. Burns and A. C. Logan, for plaintiff in error:

The Act is clearly local because it does not apply to the whole State. Nor is it proper classification.

"Within reasonable limits and for some purposes, classification is allowable. It has been sustained on the basis of population of counties on the assumption that those having a small population may ultimately have one much larger. Here the larger are excluded. We cannot assume that their population will ever be reduced to less than the number named. They are, therefore, practically and permanently excluded by the intent and purpose of this Act, which is special in its terms and local in its effect."

Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 384.

"Classification which is grounded in no necessity, and has for its sole support an evasion of the Constitution, will not be encouraged."

Scowden's App. 96 Pa. 425.

"That is not classification which merely designates one county in the Commonwealth, and contains no provisions by which any other county may, by reason of its increase of populations in the future, come within the class."

Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 260.

"But little ingenuity in the way of so-called classification would be necessary, in order to isolate every single county, borough, ward, township, and school district in the State, and provide for each its own local code."

McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 1 Cent. Rep. 111.

Local laws cannot be so spliced together as to cover the State, and make one general law.

The Act violates three constitutional provisions:

1. It regulates the affairs of counties and cities. 2. It regulates the practice and jurisdiction of courts. 3. It levies taxes under a local law.

Art. III, § 7 and art. IX, § 1, Const.

In Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 183, this court defined "affair" to be "business; something to be transacted; matter; concern." Surely these terms are broad enough to cover the subject of this Act. Indeed, the principal business of a county is the levying and collecting of taxes.

The Act changes the jurisdiction of courts. It gives to courts of common pleas authority over subject matter which they did not have before, either by statute or common law.

It is levying a tax under a local law. Section 1 of article 9 provides that all taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws.

PA.

The word "levy" in this connection means the whole process, up to the time the tax is ripe for collection. It means the assessment and revision as well as the ordinance or resolution fixing the rate.

Messrs. Willard & Warren, for defendant in error:

Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377, is clearly distinguishable. The Act of June 28, 1879, P. L. 182 (declared unconstitutional in that case), was an Act for the creation of liens in certain counties of the State, with a proviso absolutely excluding its operations in certain other counties. This was a local law, in plain violation of article 3, section 7 of the Constitution.

The reason for the decision in Davis v. Clark, was that "By the terms of the Act, the laborers in the two most populous counties of the State, although they perform the same kind of labor, are as effectually debarred from its operation as if those counties were designated by name, or were outside of the boundaries of the State." No such reason exists here.

The Act provides for appeals from the decision of county commissioners and boards of appeal and revision. There are no county commissioners charged with any matter of assessment or taxation in the County of Philadelphia; nor is there any board of appeal and revision of a third class city in that county. This fact was known to the Legislature when the Acts in question were passed. This court will take judicial notice of that fact.

There was and is now a board of revision in that county and city, charged with the entire matter of assessment and taxation. From the decisions of that board every taxpayer of Philadelphia has the right of appeal to the courts of common pleas of that county.

Applied to appeals from boards of appeal and revision of third class cities, the Act of 1878 is unquestionable. It is applicable to every third class city of the State.

The right of appeal to a citizen from an unequal and erroneous assessment, in order that the error may be corrected, is not the levying of a tax.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The right of appeal, asserted by the defendant in error in this case, is given only to the owners of real estate in counties of less than 500,000 inhabitants. The Act of May 24, 1878, which gives this right, is therefore of limited application and comes within our ruling in the case of Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 384, in which we held that "The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the Act makes it local."

There is no doubt much force in the consideration that the only county which is now excluded has a system of appeal of its own; and the present law practically makes the right general which was before local. But the difficulty we experience is that we cannot consistently hold a principle of construction applicable in one case and not applicable in another where the same conditions exist. It is perhaps unfortunate that we are obliged to apply the doctrine of Davis v. Clark to the present case, because we thereby deprive a large class of citizens of a valuable privilege. But the remedy is with the Legislature and not with us. It is far better that the law-making power should itself correct the mischief, by a new and proper enactment, than that the judicial department of the government should pursue a shifting, tortuous policy by executing a rule of construction in one case and refusing it in another when the circumstances of the two are the same.

We cannot doubt that the legislation we are considering comes within the prohibitions of the Constitution. The third section of the seventh article provides that "The General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law * * * regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts."

The Act in question is one which regulates the assessment and collection of taxes in the several counties of the Commonwealth; and the receipt and disbursement of such moneys are certainly part of the affairs of the counties. The machinery, both for the assessment and collection of taxes for county purposes, is purely local; and the local courts are clothed with a special jurisdiction to determine controversies in relation thereto. The general subject has been so much discussed in our recent decisions that enlargement upon it is unnecessary.

Judgment reversed and appeal stricken off, at the cost of the defendant in error.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover compensation as a police officer during absence, through sickness. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The court negatived the defendant's points, which were as follows:

1. Under all the evidence in the case, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.
2. The verdict should be for the defendant.

Verdict for plaintiff and judgment thereon.

The assignments of error were the action of the court in negating the defendant's points. Mr. William S. McLean, for plaintiff in error:

Physical disability, rendering the servant unable to perform his part of the contract, will excuse the master from paying the stipulated wages while the disability lasts.

In Hoboken v. Gear, 3 Dutch. 265, the contention was between the City of Hoboken and one of its policemen; and the court says of the relation existing between them: "It is at most a contract that while the party continues to perform the duties of the office, he shall receive the compensation, which may, from time to time, be appointed by law."

The plaintiff is presumed to have knowledge, as matter of law, of the ordinance.

The Act of July 7, 1879, P. L. 194, under which this suit was brought, is a local or special law, because it does not apply to all the aldermen, magistrates and justices of the peace in the Commonwealth.

Magistrates in Philadelphia are not affected by its provisions. They are "justices of the peace." They shall exercise the jurisdiction, civil and criminal, of aldermen.

The Act of July 7, 1879, P. L. 194, is not prohibited by the Constitution. Article V, section 12, provides: "In Philadelphia there shall be established, for each 30,000 inhabitants, one court not of record, of police and civil causes, with jurisdiction not exceeding $100; * * * and shall exercise such jurisdiction, civil and criminal, except as herein provided, as is now exercised by aldermen, subject to such changes, not involving an increase of civil jurisdiction or conferring political duties, as may be made by law. In Philadelphia the office of alderman is abolished."

Wiesler v. Becker, 11 L. Bar, 187 [S. C. 2 Pa. C. C. R. 103; s. p. Johnson v. Beacham, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 108.]

Mr. Justice Trunkay delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was appointed a police officer in 1881, and removed in April, 1884. Because of sickness he quit duty before the end of October, 1883, and performed no service during the next five months. In April, 1884, he served one week and was then removed. This action is to recover compensation for the five months during which he rendered no service.

In the City of Wilkesbarre the compensation of policemen is fixed by resolution of council; and in 1883, was $60 per month, payable monthly. An ordinance provides that "Any patrolman absent from duty without leave shall forfeit all pay for the time of such absence, and be fined, reprimanded or dismissed from the force, at the discretion of the council, except in cases of sickness when properly certified by a physician."

No physician certified that the plaintiff was sick. The members of the council knew it, but neither the council nor any committee gave him leave of absence, or in any way dispensed with the certificate.

It is contended by the plaintiff that his case is within the principle adopted in O'Leary v. N. Y. City, 93 N. Y. 1. But in that case the facts were different. There, the plaintiff was first excused, then given leave of absence for an indefinite time, by the proper officer, and in September following the board removed him, the removal to take effect on the first of the preceding May. The court held that "The defendant, having excused the plaintiff for good and sufficient reasons from a temporary discharge of duty, and failing to take any action indicating an intention to relieve him from his office, must be regarded as assenting to his absence, and is estopped from insisting or claiming that the plaintiff was not in its employment."

It is well settled that a person holding a public office has a prima facie right to the salary thereof, although he be physically disabled from performing his duties. If there be no law or regulation authorizing the discontinuance of the compensation during the disability, the only remedy is his removal. It may be granted that police officers are not excepted out of this general rule.

But there was a regulation of the City, providing that the officer absent from duty without leave should forfeit all pay during the time of such absence, except when sick and so certified by a physician. The plaintiff forbore to procure and give the certificate; the council forbore to remove him. Had he brought himself within the exception, the council at once might have ended liability by his removal. Under the circumstances the council preferred not to act. There is no pretense that his sickness was of such nature as to prevent his procuring a certificate. The provision in the ordinance has like force as would a similar stipulation in a contract between employer and employee. That such contract binds the party was decided in Noon v. Salisbury Mills, 8 Allen, 840.

The defendant's points should have been affirmed.

The defendant further contends that the Act of July 7, 1879, P. L. 194, enlarging the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, is unconstitutional and, therefore, the justice had no jurisdiction. The Act contains a proviso that it shall not apply to magistrates in cities of the first class. If this proviso shall be taken according to the literal meaning of its words, the Act is void. However, is it not clear that the intention was only to except Philadelphia from the operation of the statute?

Cities containing a population of 300,000 or over shall constitute the first class. Act May 23, 1874.

Philadelphia is the only city of the first class in the Commonwealth. It is notorious that there has been much legislation specially for Philadelphia, although expressed to be for cities of the first class. That phrase is sometimes used instead of the name, Philadelphia.

The Constitution, art. V, § 12, provides that in Philadelphia, courts shall be held by magistrates with jurisdiction not exceeding $100, in civil cases; and that their civil jurisdiction shall not be increased.

Section 2 of the same article provides that justices of the peace or aldermen shall be elected in the several wards, districts, boroughs and townships; and the power of the Legislature to confer civil jurisdiction is unlimited. This section applies to all the State except Philadelphia.

Section 7, art. III, prohibits the passing of any local or special law regulating the practice or jurisdiction of aldermen or justices of the peace, or extending their powers and duties.

At the argument it was contended that the Legislature could not enlarge the jurisdiction of aldermen and justices of the peace in all the State, except Philadelphia, because such an Act would be local. That would be true if the Constitution itself did not make the exception. In that city the office of alderman is abolished, certain courts created, and the power of the Legislature to change the civil jurisdiction of or confer political powers on said courts is prohibited. But that city is excepted, and the power of the Legislature to enlarge the civil jurisdiction of aldermen and justices of the peace in other parts of the State is unrestrained, save it shall not be done by a local or special law. It must be general for all the State, except as otherwise provided in the Constitution.

Were the word "Philadelphia" in place of the words "cities of the first class," there would be no difficulty; in that case there could be no doubt of the constitutionality of the Act. That the Legislature intended by the proviso, in pursuance of the Constitution, merely to except Philadelphia, cannot be doubted. Surely it did not intend that the Act should not apply to cities of the first class, should there be others besides Philadelphia sometime in the future. It intended to enact a law; not to do a vain thing. In the attempt to obey the Constitution and to except Philadelphia out of the statute it used a periphrasis instead of the proper name; and the phrase, "cities of the first class," may not always mean only Philadelphia. Having reference to the Constitution, and to prior statutes classifying cities, and to the fact that Philadelphia alone is in the first class, can the proviso be construed according to the obvious intent, to save the Act from being a nullity?

Among the rules for interpretation of statutes are the following:

The interpretation which renders a statute null and void cannot be admitted; it is an absurdity to suppose that after it is reduced to terms, it means nothing. It ought to be interpreted in such a manner that it may have effect and not to be found vain and illusive.

What tends to render an Act null and without effect, either in whole or in part, and consequently everything that introduces any change already agreed upon, is odious.

A thing within the intention is within the statute although not within the letter; and a thing within the letter is not within the statute, unless within the intention.

If such rules may be applied in the interpretation of a statute as respects its subject, with stronger reason should they apply to a clause respecting its territorial operation. Restricting the application of the proviso to the only city in the first class existing at the date of the Act, or now, and the Act is not a nullity. We are of opinion that the Act, so far as it relates to the jurisdiction of aldermen and justices of the peace, is constitutional.

This case will not often be a precedent to save statutes drawn in like manner. Were it not for the provision in the Constitution for magistrates in Philadelphia, it would be impossible to hold that the phrase, "cities of the first class," means only Philadelphia.

Judgment reversed.

APPEAL of George M. FRANKLIN, Admr.

1. At common law, a husband and wife are jointly liable in an action of damages for the torts of the wife; but the death of the wife terminates the liability of the husband. If the husband dies she may be sued alone, as if she had been feme sole when the tort was committed.
2. A married woman is personally liable for a tort committed by her, unless her husband was both personally present and directed the doing of it at the time. If directed by him, he alone is liable.
3. While his presence furnishes evidence and raises the presumption of his direction, it may be rebutted by competent evidence; and in the absence of evidence that he was present there is no presumption.
4. The evidence in this case shows a wrongful conversion of trust funds by a married woman, for which her estate is liable in damages, although the trust funds be not identified as a part of her estate.
5. A written acknowledgment by her, in which her husband joins (that she has the proceeds) and a promise to repay the trustee, will not relieve her estate from liability.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Dauphin County. Reversed.

George M. Franklin, as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of Anne Franklin, deceased, took this appeal from a decree sustaining the exceptions filed to the report of Robert Snodgrass, auditor, distributing the balance in the hands of George Nauman, executor of the will of Anne E. Henderson, deceased, and ordering that the amount of $3,000, awarded by the auditor to the appellant should be paid to Clara A. Franklin, residuary legatee, under the will of Anne E. Henderson.

The estate for distribution consisted chiefly of a mortgage of $10,000, which was the result of an investment of the proceeds of a policy of life insurance held by the decedent on the life of her husband, who died in January, 1885. The decedent died in June, 1885. The further facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. M. North, Wm. Aug. Atlee and W. M. Franklin, for appellant:

Femes covert and other persons who are non sui juris may become trustees.

If an estate be passed by trustees to a stranger by conveyance, then the grantee, if he be a volunteer, will be bound by the trust, whether he had notice of it or not; for although he had no actual notice of the equity, yet the court will presume it against him where he paid no consideration.

Mansell v. Mansell, 2 P. Wms. 678, 681.

It is well settled that if an estate in trust be conveyed to a volunteer, he will be bound by the trust, although he had no notice of it.

Sadler's App. 87 Pa. 154.

A volunteer taking with notice is in equity bound by the trust, to the same extent and in the same manner as the person from whom he purchased. And this will be the case equally, whether it be an express trust or a constructive one.

Hill, Trustees, *p. 164.

A married woman may be a trustee.

Hill, Trustees, *49.

In Dundas v. Biddle, 2 Pa. 160, this court held a married woman to be a trustee by descent of the legal estate upon her, to such an extent as to oblige her to acknowledge that she signed a deed voluntarily when she had refused so to do.

In Still v. Ruby, 35 Pa. 373, this court expressly decides that "Femes covert, like infants, lunatics and others non sui juris, may be trustees."

In Adair v. Shaw, 1 Sch. & Lef. 243, Lord Redesdale in a very careful opinion decides that married women may be trustees and that they are liable for waste committed on the trust fund during their coverture.

When these bonds were handed to the then two beneficiaries, on May 1, 1865, the trust had become a dry trust for their lives. The bequest to them was the annual interest and income of the fund for their lives and the life of the survivor; and that was a bequest of the fund itself for that term.

Clevenstine's App. 15 Pa. 495; Parker's App. 61 Pa. 478, 484, 485; Rogers v. Rogers, 7 Watts, 15.

This being so they were entitled to the custody of the fund. True, the executors might have demanded security under the Act of February 24, 1834, § 49, P. L. 81 (Purdon, 554, § 223).

This Act was the only one in force on May 1, 1865, and left it optional with the executors to demand security or not, before paying or delivering the property to the person entitled.

Mr. D. G. Eshleman, for appellee:

Mrs. Henderson was not a trustee. To call her a trustee is a misapplication of the term; a metaphor, as Lord Westbury called it in Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. Eng. & Irish App. 676.

The executors were the trustees. She owed no duties "to preserve, to ear mark, to invest" this fund for the present cestui que trust. When the executors, for the purpose of saving themselves trouble, handed the trust funds to her and her sister, they became simply the agents of the trustees in regard to these funds.

The identity of the fund is now lost, and there cannot be any further pursuit.

A married woman has no capacity to contract; Glidden v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 400; not even as to necessities, by a subsequent declaration.

Berger v. Clark, 79 Pa. 340.

The bequest was to the executors (who were to retain $8,000,) in trust, that they pay the annual interest and income thereof to testatrix's two daughters. Therefore the daughters were not entitled to the custody of the fund.

In Clevenstine's App. 15 Pa. 495, Parker's App. 61 Pa. 478, 484, 485, and Rogers v. Rogers, 7 Watts, 15, the bequest was directly to the life tenant, without a trustee.

This case was not within the Act of February 24, 1834, § 49 (Purdon, 554, pl. 223), which provides: "Whenever personal property is bequeathed to any person for life," etc.

Nor is this case within the Act of April 11, 1856, § 4 (Purdon, 1155, pl. 96).

That Act authorized married women to execute refunding bonds, when they are entitled to a distributive share of an estate; but this was not a distributive share as provided for in the Act. There was no necessity for a refunding bond. The executors did an unlawful act and violated their trust in delivering the money or bonds to the life beneficiaries. They not only could not be compelled to deliver the funds, but they were forbidden to do so by the creation of a trust.

The paper is not a refunding bond. A refunding bond is a bond with "sufficient real or personal security to be approved of by the court, with condition that if any debt or demand shall be afterwards recovered against the estate of the decedent, they will respectively refund the ratable part of such demand."

Purdon, 536, pl. 195; 553, pl. 220.

Mrs. Henderson did not contract under the Act of April 11, 1856, § 4, and she could not contract in any other way.

Mr. Justice Trunkley delivered the opinion of the court:

The executors of the will of Anne Franklin, deceased, invested the trust money in United States treasury notes. These notes, on May 1, 1865, were delivered to Anne E. Henderson and Elizabeth R. Franklin, who were entitled to the interest and income, on the express terms that they should retain the interest and that the survivor should return the notes to the executors as directed by the said will. Soon after, Miss Franklin died, and the notes passed into the hands of Mrs. Henderson. On the 5th of August, 1881, Mrs. Henderson and her husband, reciting the prior receipt and that the investment had been changed, acknowledged that they held $3,000, "the interest on which is to be retained by said Anne during her life, and the principal sum upon her decease is to be returned to the said executors, to be distributed according to the will of Anne Franklin, deceased."

That Anne E. Henderson knew that the notes were trust property under the said will is clear. It was her duty as survivor, to return them to the executors, or hold them so they could be returned after her decease. Her acknowledgment, with her husband, that she had changed the investment and held the money to be returned to the executors, put no new face on the transaction. It left her just as she stood immediately after the conversion of the notes. She had no right whatever to appropriate the notes to her own use, or the money she received for them. Because of her coverture her contract to return the note was void, so was her promise to return the sum of $8,000 which she received for the notes; but the executors gave her no authority to dispose of the notes or to use the proceeds. If she used the trust fund, or gave it away or destroyed it, her act was a wrongful conversion.

There is nothing in the case showing that she committed the tort by coercion of her husband. The presumption of coercion does not arise, unless it appear that he was present at the time of the offense committed. In the absence of evidence that he was present, there is no presumption.

Upon the facts found by the auditor, Anne E. Henderson (with full knowledge of the trust) received the trust fund and so disposed of it that it is impossible to trace it. The fund for distribution is affirmatively shown to have been derived from another source. If in her lifetime she was liable for damages for the conversion of the fund, her estate is liable. Her legatees may make the same defense which she could make, if living, and no other.

Except where otherwise provided by statute, the husband is liable for the torts of the wife, during coverture; if committed in his company and by his order, he alone is liable; if not, they are jointly liable, and the wife must be joined in the suit with her husband. And when the remedy for the tort is only damages by suit, the husband is liable with his wife. 2 Kent, Com. 149.

Husband and wife may be jointly guilty of the tortious conversion of a chattel. At common law the wife is liable to an action for her torts; and, while living, her husband may be joined and will be liable with her for the damages recovered; but if she dies then his liability terminates, while if the husband dies she may be sued alone, the same as if she had been feme sole when the tort was committed. Cord, Mar. Women, §§ 1147-1149.

A declaration in trover against husband and wife, stating that the defendants converted the property to their own use, was held sufficient, the objection having been made after verdict. Keyworth v. Hill, 3 Barn. & Ald. 685.

Although the point decided in that case related only to the pleading, the declaration was held good upon the ground that the wife could be guilty of conversion by other means than the acquisition of property. It was not gained that she was liable and responsible in case she was guilty of the conversion.

When a tort is committed by the wife she is personally liable, unless her husband was both personally present and directed the doing of it at the time. His presence furnishes evidence and raises the presumption of his direction; but it is not conclusive, and the truth may be established by competent evidence. Cassin v. Delaney, 38 N. Y. 178.

We are of opinion that the facts reveal a wrongful conversion of the trust fund by Mrs. Henderson, and that she was liable therefor in damages. Therefore the appellant is entitled to recover.

Decree reversed; and it is now considered and decreed that the report of distribution made by the auditor be and is confirmed, and that the money be paid to the parties entitled, as shown by said report. Appellee, Clara A. Franklin, to pay costs of appeal. Record remitted for enforcement of this decree.

NOTE.—The husband and wife, by the civil law, are for most purposes treated as separate, distinct persons, entitled to sue and contract with each other; by the common law they are treated as one person, the husband being that person. Mackinley v. McGregor, 3 Whart. 363; S. C. 31 Am. Dec. 522.

The husband is liable for the torts of his wife, committed both before and after coverture. Hubble v. Fogartie, 3 Rich. Law, 413; S. C. 45 Am. Dec. 775.

A husband is liable for the torts of his wife; and an action may be maintained against him to recover goods of which she holds possession. Mackinley v. McGregor, supra.

In Vermont the husband alone is liable for the wrongful detention of property by his wife, which was delivered to her in specie in his presence with his approval, and detained for their use. *Doherty v. Coverture must be clearly proved to entitle the wife to the presumption that she committed crime under her husband's compulsion. Davis v. State, 15 Ohio, 72; S. C. 45 Am. Dec. 559.

The presumption that the wife acted under the coercion of her husband can be overturned. Miller v. Swetzer, 22 Mich. 391; Cassin v. Delaney, 38 N. Y. 178.

A wife cannot be held liable in trespass for an act committed in her husband's presence and in connection with him; he alone is liable. McKeowen v. Johnson, 1 McCord, 578; S. C. 10 Am. Dec. 606; Hines v. Guile, Yelv. 107; 2 Bacon, Abr. 503; 2 Lev. 63.

His presence furnishes evidence and affords a presumption of direction; but it is not conclusive. Cassin v. Delaney, supra.

To establish the fact of his presence it is not necessary to show that the act was done literally in his sight. Commonwealth v. Burk, 11 Gray, 437; Commonwealth v. Welch, 97 Mass. 593.

If the wife acts in the absence of her husband, there is no presumption that she acts under his coercion; but if the husband is near enough for the wife to act under his immediate influence and control, although not in the same room, he is not absent within the meaning of the law. Commonwealth v. Flaherty, 1 New Eng. Rep. 530; Commonwealth v. Burk, 11 Gray, 437; Commonwealth v. Munsey, 112 Mass. 287; Commonwealth v. Pratt, 126 Mass. 462. See *Commonwealth v. NEW JERSEY.
COURT OF CHANCERY.

George W. W. BALDWIN
v.
CITY OF ELIZABETH.

1. Sales of land to the City of Elizabeth for nonpayment of taxes, for a term of 900 years, are unauthorized by law; and such sales and the certificates thereof convey no estate or interest in the property sold.

2. The right to maintain a suit, under the statute, to quiet title by removing the cloud caused by a sale for alleged illegal taxes, may be lost through laches in failing to question the validity of the tax by certiorari.

3. The constitutional amendment requiring that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general rules" does not affect the mere machinery for the collection of taxes; hence, it does not affect the time within which a sale for taxes should take place.

4. When a tax has been lawfully laid but the sale to enforce it is a nullity, the Act of 1881 (P. L. 1881, p. 194), providing that no tax, etc., shall be set aside for irregularity, if the person against whom it is assessed is liable to taxation, but that the court shall make a new assessment, has no applicability.

5. When a land owner seeks the aid of a court of equity to relieve him from a tax sale and the tax is lawful, the court should (on the principle that he who would have equity must do equity) require, as terms of setting aside the sale and certificate, that he pay the tax and interest thereon.

6. The "Act concerning past due assessments" (P. L. 1881, p. 38) affords a complete remedy to the owner of land assessed under unconstitutional laws for benefits for municipal improvements; and he therefore has no standing to seek relief in equity.

(Decided October 21, 1886.)

BILL to quiet title. On final hearing on pleadings, proofs and stipulations of counsel. The questions raised are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William P. Wilson, for complainant: The evidence shows that the land in controversy was sold by the City of Elizabeth (for the taxes of the City of Elizabeth for the years 1872-1878) for the period of 900 years; and that the City of Elizabeth was the purchaser at said sales. Such sales have been declared by the courts of this State to be illegal and void.

Green, 568; Jersey City v. Lembeck, 4 Stew. 255, 272; Blackw. Tax Titles, 496; Jones v. Gibson, 2 Taylor, N. J. 41, Battle's ed. 480.

J. J.

In 4 Cruise, Digest, title 32, chap. 18, § 2, citing Jenk. 205, it is held as follows: "There is a material difference in common-law powers, between a naked power or bare authority and a power coupled with an interest. In the case of a naked power if it is exceeded in the act done, it is entirely void."

"The power to sell lands for the nonpayment of a tax is a naked power."

Blackw. Tax Titles, 32, 441; Woodbridge v. State, 14 Vroom, 262.

The sales are void and the lien of the taxes has expired by limitation. Sections 115, 122, of the General Act respecting taxes (Rev. pp. 1163, 1165) provides that all taxes shall be a lien for two years.

Section 7, ¶ 12 of the amended Constitution provides that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value.

The amended Constitution went into force September 28, 1875, and its effect was immediately to repeal all special laws regarding taxation.

North Ward Bank v. Newark, 10 Vroom, 380.

The law under which taxes of 1879 were assessed has been declared to be unconstitutional.

Morgan v. Elizabeth, 15 Vroom, 571.

This tax of 1879 having been assessed under an unconstitutional law, the sale must be set aside and the tax must cease to be a lien and the lien cannot be revived.

See Kirkpatrick v. New Brunswick, 13 Stew. 52; S. C. 3 Cent. Rep. 82.

The fact that these sales were void leaves the taxes just as though no sale had been made.

Cassellbury v. Piscataway, 14 Vroom, 358.

The assessments in question, under the decisions of Bogert v. Elizabeth, 12 C. E. Green, 568 and Jersey City v. Lembeck, 4 Stew. 255, 272, are nullities.

In the case of Schuh v. Newark, 5 Stew. 466, which was a bill to quiet title and in which were set up exactly such assessments as are set up in this case, the court of chancery made a decree for the complainant. The case was taken to the court of errors and the decree below was affirmed and the doctrine laid down in the Bogert Case was reaffirmed.

As to the sales for the taxes of 1879. The charter of the City of Elizabeth has been declared by the supreme court to be unconstitutional.

Morgan v. Elizabeth, 15 Vroom, 571.

The sale must, therefore, be void and is a cloud on the title and should be removed.

In the case of Woodbridge v. Allen, 14 Vroom, 262, the court says: "The power to sell lands for taxes is a naked power; and the validity of the title derived from such a sale depends upon a strict compliance with the directions of the statute. * * * The onus probandi is upon the purchaser; and he must show affirmatively that everything has been done which the statute makes essential to the due execution of the power."

Mr. Frank Bergen, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed under the Act "To compel the determination of claims to real estate in certain cases and to quiet the title to the same."

With this case several others, brought by other complainants against the same defendant for like relief and under a similar state of facts, were argued. The questions presented under all of them will, for convenience, be considered and disposed of in this opinion.

The City sold land of the complainant for nonpayment of taxes for years prior to 1879, for the term of nine hundred years, becoming itself the purchaser at the sale. It is insisted that such sales and the certificates made in pursuance thereof are nullities, because a sale of land to the City for unpaid taxes for a term exceeding fifty years is unauthorized by law.

The City sold land of the complainant for the unpaid taxes of 1879 and became itself the purchaser and such sale was for a term of fifty years, but the complainant insists that the sale was made after the expiration of the lien for taxes given by law, and it appears that those taxes were assessed under an unconstitutional law.

There are, upon the properties of the complainant, assessments for municipal improvements laid by the City under the city charter, which provided for laying such assessment by a rule which was in contravention of the constitutional rights of the land owners, and the assessments were so laid. It is insisted by the complainant that this court should declare that such assessments for that reason constitute no lien upon the lands. On the other hand, the City insists that this court ought not to declare the before mentioned tax sales and certificates null and void, except upon condition that the complainants, respectively, pay the taxes with interest thereon assessed against them respectively, for nonpayment whereof their lands were sold.

The sales of land to the City for a term of nine hundred years, for nonpayment of taxes, were unauthorized by law. Schlatt v. Grosch, 4 Stew. 199; Morgan v. Elizabeth, 15 Vroom, 571.

It should be decreed, but on terms as herein-after stated, that the sales and certificates thereof convey no estate or interest in the property. The sales of land for the taxes of 1879 were for a term of fifty years. The tax was, however, assessed under an unconstitutional law. Morgan v. Elizabeth, supra.

The complainant insists that on that ground the sales (and certificates) for that tax should be declared null and void and that it should be decreed that the tax is no lien or incumbrance upon the property. The complainant had a remedy at law by certiorari. Rev. p. 1045, § 16; Morgan v. Elizabeth, supra.

If he has lost it, it is by reason of his laches. This court has always been unwilling to interfere to restrain the collection of a tax which is illegal and void, merely because of its illegality; but requires that there be some special circumstances attending the injury threatened to bring the case within some recognized head of equity jurisdiction. Dusenbury v. Newark, Bogert v. Elizabeth and Lewis v. Elizabeth, 10 C. E. Green, 295, 426 and 298.

And in Jersey City v. Lembeck, 4 Stew. 255, it was expressly held that the Act to quiet titles does not apply to cases where a party in possession of land can throw the hostile claim into a court of law and thus get rid of the cloud upon his title; or when, having had the power to do so, he has lost it by his inaction.

It is urged that the sales for the tax of 1879 were made after the expiration of the lien. The charter of the City provides that the tax shall be a lien for four years (the sale took place within that period); but the general law provides that the lien for unpaid taxes shall continue for two years. Both provisions were in force when the amendments to the Constitution were adopted; and it is argued that the provision of the Constitution as amended, that "Property shall be assessed for taxes under general rules, according to its true value," by its own force abrogated the provision of the charter and substituted for it that of the general law. It is enough to say upon this head that the constitutional provision does not affect the mere machinery for the assessment or collection of taxes. Trustees, etc. v. Trenton, 3 Stew. 667.

As to the sales for nine hundred years above mentioned: the Act entitled "A General Act Respecting Taxes, Assessments and Water Rates" (P. L. 1881, p. 194), provides that no tax, assessment or water rate shall be set aside or reversed for any irregularity or defect in form or illegality in assessing, laying or levying it or in the proceeding for collecting it, if the person against whom or the property upon which it is assessed or laid in fact is liable to taxation, assessment or imposition in respect of the purposes for which the tax, assessment or water rate is laid, assessed or imposed; but that the court shall make a new assessment, etc. It does not provide that no invalid or unlawful sale for a lawfully imposed tax, assessment or water rate shall be set aside. Nor does it provide that if the court shall set aside any such sale it shall direct a new one or shall set it aside only upon terms of payment. It deals only with the tax, assessment or rate. And when the tax, assessment or rate has been lawfully laid, assessed or imposed (but the sale for it is a nullity) the statute has no applicability.

To hold otherwise would in effect extend the lien given by law for such assessments indefinitely, and practically annul the limitation as to the term for which land may be sold for nonpayment thereof. Such was not the intention of the Legislature. But when, as in this case, the land owner seeks the aid of this court to relieve him from the tax sale, and the tax is lawful, it is but reasonable that the court should, on the principle that he who would have equity must do equity, require as terms of setting aside the sale and certificate that he pay the tax and interest thereon at the rate fixed from time to time since the tax was levied, by the general law of the State limiting the rate of interest upon contracts. Gage v. Pumpelly, 115 U. S. 454 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 449].

As to the assessments for municipal improvements: "the Act of 1881, entitled 'An Act Concerning Past Due Assessments in Certain Towns and Townships of this State' (P. L. 1881, p. 38), provides that the common council, board of township committee, or governing body of any town or township, may reduce assessments laid upon illegal and erroneous principles and without regard to the peculiar benefit derived by reason thereof, or may agree to arbitrate the assessments upon the application of the owner or owners of the property; and that if the common council, board of township committee, or other governing body shall refuse to arbitrate, arbitrators may be appointed by a justice of the supreme court on like application.

This beneficial and remedial Act renders it unnecessary for the owner of land assessed under unconstitutional laws, for benefits for municipal improvements, to have recourse to equity for relief; and its provisions are so just and equitable that he should be required to obtain relief by application under it. See Newark v. Schuh, 7 Stew. 262.

The tax sales for nine hundred years and the certificates thereof will be set aside, upon terms that the complainants pay the tax and interest thereon as above adjudged. The relief prayed, as to the sales and the certificates thereof for the taxes of 1879 and as to the assessments for municipal improvements, will be denied.

No costs will be awarded to either side.

MAYOR and Aldermen OF JERSEY CITY,
v.
CENTRAL R. R. CO. OF NEW JERSEY.

- *1. A grant under which it is claimed that authority is given to destroy a public right should be strictly construed.
2. A railroad corporation having authority, when public necessity requires, to change the grade of the streets crossing its tracks, will not be permitted to exercise its power in that respect, except upon the same terms that the municipality within which the streets are located may exercise like power; that is, upon the payment of damages to those injured by the change.
3. The board of public works of Jersey City can exercise the power conferred upon it by the Legislature, only when regularly convened and acting as a body.
4. A municipality, having the control and supervision of the public highways within its territorial limits, may maintain a suit in equity to prevent any alteration of the streets or injury to them which will deprive the public of their use.

BILL for injunction. Granted.

On final hearing on bill and answer and proofs taken before a master.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William D. Edwards and John A. Blair, for complainants.

Mr. Benjamin Williamson, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The object of this suit is to procure a decree restraining the defendant from changing the grade of Communipaw Avenue at the point where the avenue crosses the railroad of the defendant. The avenue is one of the public streets of Jersey City. It is of ancient origin, having been in existence long prior to the construction of the defendant's railroad, and is an important thoroughfare over which there is a large amount of travel daily.

The railroad of the defendant, at the point where it crosses the avenue, is built in a cut; and this condition of affairs made it the duty of the defendant, according to a provision of its charter; to construct and keep in repair a good and sufficient bridge over their railroad at the point where it crosses the avenue, so that public travel on the avenue should not be impeded. P. L. 1847, p. 183.

The defendant built a bridge at the point in question in the spring of 1864. The bridge thus became a part of the avenue. At that time the avenue was neither graded nor paved. In 1865 the grade of the avenue was established by the proper municipal authority. It was made to conform to the bridge the defendant had previously erected. Since then the avenue on both sides of the bridge has been graded, in conformity to the grade established in 1865, and paved with Belgian pavement; sidewalks laid, gutters made and curbstones set. The lands adjacent to the avenue, on both sides of the bridge, have also been graded, in conformity to the grade established in 1865, and improved by the erection of dwellings and other structures thereon.

In August, 1883, the defendant was warned by the street commissioner of Jersey City that its bridge was so badly out of repair as to render travel over it dangerous, and it was required to put it in a proper state of repair. It thereupon built a new bridge. The new structure is three feet higher at each end than the old. The reason assigned for this change in the elevation of the bridge is that it was necessary to increase the distance between the railroad and the bridge, to prevent injury to train hands who may be required, by the proper discharge of their duties, to be on the top of freight cars when passing under the bridge. Two lives have been lost, it is said, in consequence of the old bridge not being at a sufficient elevation.

It is obvious at a glance that the change the defendant proposes to make in the elevation of its bridge, if carried out, will, unless the grade of the street on either side of the bridge is also changed, render the avenue wholly useless as a public highway, and operate as a practical vacation of it. A rise of three feet, or even two, between the road bed of the avenue and the floor of the bridge will render the avenue impassable and utterly destroy it as a public highway. By force of the charter of Jersey City, after the grade of a street has once been established and the street graded in conformity thereto no change can be made in its grade, without the consent in writing of the owners of a majority of the property to be assessed therefor, and upon payment to the owners of property injured thereby of the damages they have sustained in consequence of such change. P. L. of 1871, p. 1122, § 58.

It is thus made apparent that if the defendant has power to make the change in the elevation of its bridge which it proposes, and if it exercises it in this instance, it must inevitably result in the imposition of serious burdens upon certain persons, which they ought not to be required to bear; or, otherwise, in the complete destruction of an ancient and important public highway.

In view of the fact that a change in the grade cannot be made, except with the consent of those who will be injured by it, it may be taken, I think, as almost absolutely certain that no consent will be given, and that the other alternative (the destruction of a valuable public right) must ensue. A power which is so autocratic as to invest its grantee with authority, either to impose unjust burdens on the citizen or otherwise take away valuable public rights, should be construed with the utmost rigor, and should never be held to have been granted, except it is made perfectly clear that such a grant was within the scope of the grantor's power and that he intended to confer authority of that extraordinary nature.

Chief Justice Whelpley, in Warren R. R. Co. ads. v. State, 5 Dutch, 858, said: "Public highways ought not to be destroyed, even in part, under pretense of legislative authority, unless it be conferred either in express terms or by necessary implication. If the words are ambiguous, the construction ought to be in favor of the common right of highway, not against it."

Other eminent judges have expressed the same view. Morris & Essex R. R. Co. v. Newark, 2 Stock. 352; Greenwich v. Easton & Amboy R. R. Co. 9 C. E. Green, 217.

The only grant to which the defendant points, as the source of its power to raise the bridge above the grade of the street, is the ninth section of its charter; a reference to which has already been made for the purpose of showing that it imposed a duty on the defendant. This section declares that it shall be the duty of the defendant to construct and keep in repair good and sufficient bridges, or passages, over or under its railroad, where any public or other road shall cross the same, so that the passage of carriages, horses and cattle on the said road shall not be impeded thereby. P. L. of 1847, p. 133.

These words have received judicial construction. They have been construed to impose upon the defendant the duty to keep, at all times and under all circumstances, the public highways, at the points where they cross the railroad, in a condition fit for safe and convenient use. The duty is a continuing duty, which in its performance must be measured by circumstances. Thus, a bridge or passage way which at one time would be adequate to the public accommodation, might at a subsequent period, from increase of business or population, be totally inadequate; and consequently a provision which at one juncture would be a discharge of the duty would, at another, amount to its infraction. Suppose a public street in a town to have been originally laid out over the surface of the railroad track; and that, by reason of the growth of the business of the railroad at that locality, trains should pass in such quick succession as to render the street almost impassable, there can be no doubt that under such circumstances the railroad company could not discharge itself from the obligation which this section imposes, except by passing the street thus obstructed under its railroad, so as to restore it to public use.

Now, in such a condition of affairs, where a change of grade is absolutely indispensable to the safe and convenient use of the street as a public highway, it was held that the defendant had power to alter the grade. Central R. R. Co. of N. J. ads. State, 8 Vroom, 220.

But of course, such power can only be exercised in conformity to law. In no event can it be exercised, except under the pressure of public emergency. It may be exercised to restore or save a public highway; but even then if damages must, by law, be paid to those injured by the alteration as a condition on which alone the alteration can be made, the defendant would be bound to comply with such condition before exercising the power. These considerations make it entirely clear that the defendant's act was wrongful. It was without the least justification in public necessity, and consequently without legal warrant.

But the defendant says that it raised the bridge with the consent of one or more of the members of the board of public works of Jersey City, which body alone has authority, by law, to make an alteration in the grade of the streets of Jersey City. If this fact were fully established, it would neither justify nor excuse the act of the defendant. The members of this board have no authority whatever as individuals. It is only when they are regularly convened and acting as a body that they can use the powers conferred upon them by the Legislature. Their individual action is without the slightest legal force. The proofs show, however, that there was no consent by even an individual member of the board. What occurred was this: at a meeting at the bridge in question, between the chief engineer of the defendant and one or more members of the board of public works, the chief engineer stated that the defendant wanted to raise the bridge, and that he would go on and raise it unless he was forbidden to do so. He was not forbidden, and therefore assumed that they consented. His assumption would not have been warranted, even if he made his declaration to the board when regularly convened for the transaction of business.

The complainants are the proper parties to apply for relief in such a case as this; and the injury which they seek to have redressed belongs to the class which this court may redress by injunction. It is settled that a municipality which has, by law, the control and supervision of the public highways within its territorial limits may maintain a suit in equity to prevent any alteration of them or injury to them which will deprive the public of their safe and convenient use. Greenwich v. Easton & Amboy R. R. Co. 9 C. E. Green, 217; S. C. on appeal, 10 C. E. Green, 565.

The complainants are entitled to an injunction requiring the defendant to reduce its bridge so as to conform to the grade of the avenue. The complainants are also entitled to costs.

MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. of New York
v.

Joseph M. EVERETT.

A, the owner of certain real estate, executed a deed thereof to B, in trust to execute a conveyance of the premises to such person as C might appoint by a writing under seal in her lifetime, or by will, and to permit C to occupy the same and receive the rents and profits thereof during her life. This deed was made upon a valuable consideration moving from C, the cestui que trust. A and B both died without C's having made any appointment under the trust deed, A leaving a will bequeathing all his estate to C. Thereafter C orally requested the principal heir at law of B to convey the premises to her, which was done by deed executed by the principal and certain other, but not all, the heirs at law of B.

Held, that the power given to B to convey to C's appointee was a power coupled with a trust; that C's appointment of herself was valid; that the fact that her request for a conveyance was oral, instead of in writing, was such a defect in the execution of the power as equity will correct; that the conveyance of the legal title to C by heirs at law of B was valid, and that a title to the premises acquired through C thereunder is good.

ON bill for relief. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. G. Burnham, for complainant.

Mr. William Clark, for defendant.

Rayon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed to restrain the defendant from prosecuting an action of ejectment to recover the possession of land in Middlesex County, to which he claims title under the provisions of a trust deed from Joseph McChesney to Doctor Charles G. McChesney, dated September 5, 1853; and if necessary to establish the title of the complainant under a conveyance of the property to Elizabeth M. Everett under that deed, the complainant's title being derived from her through foreclosure proceedings upon a mortgage given by her grantee.

The deed from Joseph McChesney to Doctor McChesney recited that Mrs. Everett, one of the children of the grantor, had paid and discharged out of her own funds sundry debts and claims against her father, and had laid out and expended from time to time large sums of money in and about his support and maintenance, and had also agreed to and with him to board, clothe and maintain him in a comfortable manner for and during the term of his natural life; and that it was the wish, purpose and intent of the grantor to settle and secure the real estate and premises described in the deed to and for her use and benefit as thereinafter set forth; and the deed thereupon witnessed that the grantor, in order to carry into effect such wish, purpose and intent, and in consideration of the premises and the natural love and affection which he had for his daughter Mrs. Everett, and also in consideration of $1, granted, bargained, sold, aliened, released, conveyed and confirmed to Charles G. McChesney, his heirs and assigns, the property in question, a tract of forty-four acres, to the use of the grantee, his heirs and assigns forever; but, nevertheless, upon the trust and to and for the several uses, intents and purposes thereafter expressed, limited and declared, and to no other use, purpose and intent whatever; that is to say, upon the trust that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, should and would grant, bargain, sell, assign, transfer and convey the premises, or any and every part and parcel thereof, unto such person or persons and to and for such uses, purposes, estates and interests, and in such parts, shares and portions, form and manner as Mrs. Everett might at any time during her natural life and, notwithstanding any coverture, by writing under her hand and seal, direct and appoint; and in trust that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, before and until such direction and appointment should be made, and for and at all times during the natural life of Mrs. Everett, should and would permit and suffer, authorize and empower her to use, possess, occupy and enjoy the premises and every part and parcel thereof; and the rents, issues and profits thereof to have, take and receive to and for her own sole and separate use and benefit, free from the debts, control or engagements of her then present or any future husband; and in trust, from and immediately after her decease, to grant, bargain, sell, release, convey, confirm and dispose of the premises and any and every part and parcel thereof, unto such person or persons and to and for such uses, purposes, estates and interests, and in such parts, shares and portions, form and manner as she at any time during her life, notwithstanding any coverture, should by her last will and testament in writing, duly executed according to law, or any writing purporting to be her last will and testament or in the nature thereof and executed as a will, direct, limit, give and appoint the same or any part thereof, and, in default of such direction, limitation and appointment, then in trust for her right heirs; provided always, nevertheless, that it should and might be lawful to and for the grantee, his heirs and assigns from time to time, in the first place, to deduct, retain and reimburse unto himself and themselves (out of the rents, issues and proceeds of the said premises) all such costs, charges and expenses as he or they or any of them should or might sustain, expend, pay or be put unto, in and about the performance of the trust thereby in them reposed, or in any manner concerning the same.

It may be stated that in 1857 the grantor died, leaving a will dated July 22, 1850, and a codicil thereto dated June 25, 1852, by which will and codicil he gave to Mrs. Everett all his estate, real and personal.

Doctor McChesney died in 1863, leaving no lineal descendants. His heir at the common law was Stephen F. McChesney, the oldest son of his deceased brother John. The premises had not, nor had any part thereof, been conveyed away when Doctor McChesney died.

After the death of Doctor McChesney, and on or about January 6, 1864, Mrs. Everett (she being then a widow), being desirous of acquiring the legal title to the property, under the advice and direction of her counsel requested the heirs at law of Doctor McChesney to convey the premises to her so that she might become seised of them by a good and perfect legal title in fee simple absolute. In compliance with that request Stephen F. McChesney (the heir at common law) and others, heirs at law of Doctor McChesney, by deed dated January 6, 1864, and acknowledged January 6, 1865, conveyed the property to her in fee to her own use. The deed declared that the property was the same conveyed by Joseph McChesney to Doctor McChesney by the before mentioned deed, in trust for Mrs. Everett, as particularly set forth in the deed; and that, Doctor McChesney having died holding the title in trust under that deed, the grantors, his heirs, executed the conveyance to her for the purpose of vesting in her the legal title of the property.

The executrix of Jonathan E. McChesney, one of the brothers of Doctor McChesney, also made a conveyance to Mrs. Everett for the same purpose. The last mentioned conveyance was dated January 9, 1865, and was made under a power contained in the will of Jonathan E. McChesney to convey all the real estate of the testator.

It appears that certain of the heirs at law of Doctor McChesney did not join in the conveyance to Mrs. Everett. On January 28, 1865, Mrs. Everett conveyed the property to George Farr in fee for his own use, for the consideration of $11,000, subject to certain mortgages; one for $300 and another for $600, given by Joseph McChesney in his lifetime, and the others given by Mrs. Everett, one for $500 and the other for $1,000. The principal of those mortgages, amounting in all to $2,400, constituted a part of the consideration of the conveyance.

On February 10, 1871, Farr mortgaged the property to the complainant to secure the payment of $20,000. Under foreclosure proceedings in this court upon that mortgage, it was decreed that a part of the property be sold to raise and pay to the complainant $21,400, besides costs and interest. The part so ordered to be sold was purchased by the complainant for $8,850, and was conveyed to it accordingly by the sheriff of Middlesex County, by deed dated September 28, 1873. Immediately afterwards the complainant entered into possession, and has held such possession ever since.

Mrs. Everett died February 28, 1883. In May, 1884, her son and only child, Joseph M. Everett, brought an action of ejectment in the supreme court against William D. Perrine, who then held the property so bought by the complainant, as tenant of the complainant, to recover possession of the premises; and this suit was brought to restrain him from prosecuting that action and to establish the complainant's title.

At the death of Doctor McChesney (who died intestate) the title to the property descended to Stephen F. McChesney, who was his heir at the common law, Stephen being the oldest son of Doctor McChesney's deceased oldest brother, John C. McChesney. At Mrs. Everett's request, Stephen, with other heirs at law of Doctor McChesney, conveyed the property to her, in order that she might have the legal title to her own use. This was an effectual transfer of the title to her in equity.

The execution of the power was defective in one and only in one respect, viz.: the form in which the request for a conveyance was made. The trust deed provided that the request should be in writing. It appears to have been oral merely. Stephen testifies that he executed the deed to Mrs. Everett at her request. Equity will, in a proper case, aid the defective execution of a power by supporting, correcting and completing it. Here the conveyance to Farr was in consideration of $20,000. Moreover, it appears clearly from the trust deed itself that the conveyance to Doctor McChesney was itself upon a valuable consideration moving from Mrs. Everett herself. It states that she had paid debts and claims against the grantor, out of her own funds, and had expended large sums of money in and about his support and maintenance, and also had agreed with him that she would clothe, board and maintain him for the rest of his life. The power given to Doctor McChesney was not a naked one; it was coupled with a trust; and his heir at law was bound to convey the property to her on her request. The trust was for her benefit, to enable her to dispose of the property at will. No trust was declared as to the purchase money of any sale to be made by her; but the trust was, that on request from her the trustee should grant, bargain, sell, assign, transfer and convey the property to such person or persons as she might designate; and to and for such uses, purposes, estates and interests, and in such parts, shares, portions, form and manner as she should direct and appoint. She might have directed a conveyance to another person to her own use and it would have been valid. She had the same power to direct, as she did, a conveyance to herself for her own use. It is quite clear that the object of the grantor in the trust deed was to give her full and absolute power over the property, and at the same time to protect her against any interference by her husband in the enjoyment or control of it or her dominion over it. The intention to execute the power is manifest, and it was the duty of the trustee to execute it. He was bound to convey on request. The fact that the request was not in writing obviously ought not to be allowed to defeat the conveyance. It is a mere formal defect.

The deed will be decreed to be a valid conveyance, and the injunction will be made perpetual. The complainant is entitled to costs.

ON application for an injunction. Denied.

Heard on bill and affidavits on the part of the complainant, and affidavits on the part of the defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Randal Morgan and Joseph B. Bedle, for complainant.

Messrs. Peter Bentley and James B. Vredenburg, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

This is an application for an injunction. The litigants are corporations organized to manufacture and supply illuminating gas. Although other corporations than the Jersey City Gaslight Company and the Consumers Gas Company of Jersey City are parties to the suit, the questions in dispute will be considered as though the two corporations just named were the only litigants. This course will allow the only question now at issue between the parties to be presented in its simplest form, and save the necessity of adverting to facts quite immaterial to the present inquiry.

The complainant, the Jersey City Gaslight Company, was incorporated in 1849, by special charter. P. L. of 1849, p. 279.

It has power to manufacture and sell gas and to use the streets and public grounds of Jersey City to lay pipes to supply gas. The defendant, the Consumers Gas Company of Jersey City, is a corporation organized under the general law authorizing the formation of gaslight corporations. Rev. p. 460.

Its articles of association were filed December 1, 1883. It, too, has authority to use the streets and public grounds of Jersey City to lay pipes to supply gas, provided it first obtains the consent of the municipal authorities. The defendant has obtained such consent, and has laid its pipes, and is now supplying such of the citizens of Jersey City as choose to purchase their gas.

The complainant's charter does not prescribe the quality of the gas which it shall furnish, nor is any duty, in that regard, imposed upon it by any other statute. It is at liberty to furnish gas of any quality it pleases. The defendant, however, has not the same liberty. The statute under which it is organized prescribes the quality of the gas which it shall furnish, both in respect to its illuminating power and its purity; and declares that it shall be subject to a penalty of $100 a day for each and every day that the gas supplied by it is not in accordance with the requirements of the statute. Rev. p. 462, § 18; Rev. p. 1841, § 1.

The complainant charges that the gas which the defendant is supplying does not come up to the standard prescribed by the statute; and it says, moreover, that the defendant has never made gas of the purity required by the statute. For present purposes this charge will be considered to be true. A cursory examination of the affidavits certainly leads to that result. This fact constitutes the whole of the equity on which the complainant's present application rests.

The argument by which the complainant attempts to vindicate its right to an injunction in this case is this: it says that the Legislature, in enacting the statute under which the defendant was organized, did not intend to authorize or permit corporations formed under that statute to compete with existing corporations, specially chartered, unless such new corporations furnished gas of the quality prescribed by the statute; and it therefore insists that the defendant, in furnishing gas of a quality below that which the statute requires, is carrying on an unlawful competition with it, and thus doing what amounts in its practical effect to an invasion of its franchise. Or, to state the complainant's contention in a more direct form, it says that in order to give full effect to the legislative purpose, the statute must be read as though that part of it which prescribes the quality of the gas to be furnished, contained words expressly declaring that no corporation organized under the statute shall have the right to supply gas to any locality where gas is already supplied by a corporation specially chartered, unless the gas which it supplies shall be of the quality prescribed by the statute.

The complainant claims a conditional monopoly. That is what its claim, plainly stated, amounts to. It says that unless the defendant furnishes gas of a specified quality it, alone, is to have the right to supply the citizens of Jersey City with gas. Whenever a suitor asserts a right of this nature as the foundation of his right to relief he must produce, in support of his claim, a plain grant, or fail. To doubt, in such a case, is to deny. It is a cardinal rule of construction that all public grants are to be strictly construed, and that whatever is not plainly granted shall be understood to be withheld. An attentive perusal of the statute under consideration fails to present to my mind the least evidence that the Legislature, in passing it, had any such purpose in view as that attributed to them by the complainant. A contrary purpose seems to be plainly manifest.

The twenty-second section (Rev. p. 463) expressly provides that whenever a corporation shall be organized under this statute, to supply gas to any city, town or village which is already supplied with gas, the new corporation shall, within certain periods fixed by the statute, extend its main pipes so as to supply all persons of that particular locality with gas. And the object of this provision is declared to be "that all may enjoy the benefits of competition."

The twenty-fifth section (Rev. p. 464) then declares:

"That no exclusive privilege heretofore granted in the charter of any company to construct and operate gas works shall hereafter continue to be or be construed to remain exclusive."

The object of these provisions cannot be misunderstood. They were designed to abrogate all exclusive or monopoly privileges, and to promote free competition in the supply of gas.

But if the statute did not contain these provisions, I still think the complainant's construction could not be adopted. Its construction ascribes to the Legislature a design to discriminate against the public, and in favor of a few persons of a particular class. The complainant is at liberty to furnish gas of any quality it sees fit; while the defendant, to escape daily penalties, must furnish it of a specified quality. There is no reciprocity of duty, in respect to the quality of the gas to be furnished, between the complainant and the defendant. The one is free and the other is bound. So that, to adopt the complainant's construction, we must say that the Legislature meant there should be no competition between existing corporations and corporations organized under this statute, except upon very unequal terms, with all the advantages in favor of existing corporations. Such a purpose is so manifestly opposed to sound public policy, so contrary to the spirit of our laws, and so clearly in conflict with popular judgment that it should not be attributed to the Legislature, except upon the most cogent evidence.

But suppose this view to be erroneous, and let it be conceded that there are expressions in the statute which support, to some extent, the complainant's construction, then its attitude before the court would be this: it would be asking the court to protect it by injunction, in the enjoyment of a right which as yet is unsettled and undetermined. Now, nothing is better settled, as a rule of equity procedure, than that a complainant is not entitled to a preliminary injunction to protect a right which depends upon a disputed question of law, and which question has never been adjudged in his favor by the courts of law of this State. Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. R. Co. 2 Stew. 299.

But there is another objection to the complainant's application, quite as fatal as either of the other two. The defendant is a corporation de jure. It is not denied, by anything which is entitled to be regarded as proof, that it is a legal corporate entity. As a corporation de jure, with its powers in full vigor, it has a lawful right to manufacture and sell gas, and to use the streets and public grounds of Jersey City to transmit gas to its customers. If it furnishes gas of a quality inferior to that which the statute makes it its duty to furnish, its delinquency may constitute such a misuse or abuse of its franchises as would justify the State in instituting proceedings to have its franchises declared forfeited. But that is a matter in which the complainant has no concern, and a wrong over which this court has no jurisdiction.

It is an established principle of the law concerning corporations that the charter of a corporation will not be declared to be forfeited for misuse or abuse of its powers, except in a proceeding instituted directly for that purpose, by the government granting the charter. In such matters the courts will never act upon the relation of any individual; and the reason is that the matter is one which concerns the State alone. The State may exact the forfeiture or waive it, as may seem best to it for the public interests. 2 Kent, Com. 313; Commonwealth v. Union Ins. Co. 5 Mass. 230; Boston Glass Manufactory v. Langdon, 24 Pick. 49; Folger v. Columbian Ins. Co. 99 Mass. 267; Kishacoquillas Turnpike Co. v. M'Conaby, 16 Serg. & R. 140; Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371; Slee v. Bloom, 5 Johns. Ch. 366

The question whether a corporation has forfeited its franchises or not is one over which the common-law courts have exclusive jurisdiction, and over which this court has no control whatever in the absence of legislation. Nat. Debt R. Co. v. Central R. R. Co. 5 Stew. 755.

To give the complainant the writ it asks would be to deprive the defendant of the right to exercise its franchise; and this court would thus pronounce a judgment which, in its practical effect, would amount to a judgment of forfeiture. No judicial tribunal can do, by indirect, what it has no authority to do directly.

But I think it should be said in addition that if the defendant has been guilty of a breach of its statutory duty, its misconduct has not resulted in legal injury to the complainant. The complainant is not a consumer of the gas furnished by the defendant; no contract relations exist between it and the defendant; and so, if the defendant is not performing the whole measure of its statutory duty, its delinquency does the complainant no harm.

That provision of the statute which prescribes the quality of the gas which corporations organized under it shall supply was obviously designed for the benefit and protection of such persons as should become consumers of its gas; and such persons are the only persons who can be injured by its violation. Its violation invades no right of the complainant, and deprives it of nothing which the law secures to it; consequently it cannot be made the basis of any sort of judicial relief to it.

For all these reasons the complainant's application must be denied, with costs.

1. The title acquired by an assignee for the benefit of creditors, although good as to the property assigned, is (as to assets in other States, whose policy it is not to recognize, as against the claims of creditors of the assignor domiciled therein, the validity of general assignments with preferences) liable to be defeated by attachments sued out of the courts of such other States by creditors domiciled therein, to recover their debts out of such assets.
2. An agreement made by the receiver of a corporation with the general assignee of a creditor of the corporation in another State, to pay a certain portion of the indebtedness of the corporation to the assignor, in satisfaction of the debt, in consideration of the assignee's promise to accept of such payment in compromise, and ratified by the court, is to be regarded in equity as a novation, and the obligation is thenceforward a new one between the receiver and the assignee; and the claims of attaching creditors of the assignor in this State, based upon the policy of this State in respect to assignments giving preferences and not asserted until after the receiver had become liable to the assignee on said agreement, cannot avail against that agreement.

(Decided 1886.)

BILL for relief. On order to show cause why injunction should not issue. Order discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. Wallace, for complainants.

Mr. C. Parker, for assignee.

Mr. J. T. Stockton, for receiver.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The North River Construction Company, a corporation of this State, was by this court declared to be insolvent under the Act concerning corporations, and Ashbel Green, Esq., was appointed receiver January 12, 1884.

By an order of the Supreme Court of New York, made two days afterwards, he was appointed receiver in that State in aid of his receivership here. Among the claims against the corporation was one of large amount in favor of John Lee, for money due upon a contract between him and the corporation. Lee sued the company in the Supreme Court of New York for his claim, and in November, 1884, recovered judgment for $52,304.89. On or about the 18th of December following he made a general assignment, with preferences, in New York for the benefit of his creditors. His assignee was Thomas B. Rutan.

The assets of the construction company consisted almost entirely of the stock and bonds of the New York, West Shore & Buffalo Railway Company. The railroad of that company had, at the time of the appointment of the receiver of the construction company, just been opened to Buffalo; but it was in an unfinished condition and the company was in financial embarrassment. In June, 1884, a suit for foreclosure of mortgage was begun against the railway company, and receivers were appointed thereunder.

Lee and others put in in that suit, by their answers, their claims to mechanics' liens, against the property of the railway company, for their work, etc., under their contract with the construction company. About 200 suits were begun, to which the receiver of the construction company was a party.

In July, 1884, the receiver, apprehending total loss of the West Shore bonds and stock held by him, in order to prevent it entered into and promoted a scheme of reorganization of the West Shore Company. To that end he called a meeting of the creditors of the construction company; and they, with but few and comparatively insignificant exceptions, agreed to authorize him to make a compromise, one part of which was that they should accept 50 per cent of the face value of their respective claims in full thereof, in cash, to be paid before January 5, 1886. He obtained the consent of the stockholders of the construction company also and he then effected an arrangement with the mortgage bondholders of the railway company, by which the decree in the foreclosure suit was entered, the property was sold and a new railroad corporation organized. He thus obtained securities from which he raised the money necessary to carry out the compromise and pay the creditors of his company in accordance therewith.

Among the creditors who consented were Lee and Rutan, his assignee. The latter did so under special permission obtained from the County Court of Kings County, New York, by order made September 12, 1885, by which he was authorized to accept 50 per cent on the amount found due Lee on his claim against the railway company and the construction company, amounting to $48,638.38 (the amount at which it was allowed by the receiver) and interest, and to execute the necessary papers to carry the compromise into effect; such payment to be made to the assignee on or before January 5, 1886. This order was made upon formal petition, and upon due proof of notice to Lee's creditors.

The receiver, very soon after the making of that order, made the agreement of compromise with Lee & Rutan.

It appears that an agreement dated New York, July 13, 1885, was signed by the creditors of the construction company, by which they agreed, with the receiver and with each other, that they would accept, in full payment and satisfaction of their claims against that company and the railway company on that account, 50 per cent of the face value thereof, as allowed by the receiver, provided notice was given on or before October 1, 1885, that the same would be paid in cash on or before the 5th of January, 1886; and they further thereby agreed to sign all necessary papers to carry out the agreement.

On the 26th of September, 1885, the receiver, at his office in the City of New York, gave to the assignee a written notice, signed by himself as receiver, that pursuant to the agreement 50 per cent of the face value of the claim of John Lee, without interest, would be paid to the assignee, in cash, on or before the 5th of January, 1886. The assignee has demanded payment of the money, but the receiver declined to pay, because of the stay granted in this cause.

On or about October 27, 1885, a writ of attachment was issued out of the supreme court of this State, at the suit of the Wallis Iron Works, a corporation of this State, against Lee, as a nonresident debtor; and by permission of this court it was executed by attaching the money in the receiver's hands for the Lee claim. The attachment was levied upon it as a claim of the said John Lee, defendant, against the North River Construction Company, in the hands of Ashbel Green, receiver of the said North River Construction Company, amounting to $48,638.38. The claim of the Wallis Iron Works was, when the attachment was issued, held by the complainant Charles W. Kimball (it was assigned to him September 22, 1884), and the writ of attachment, although issued in the name of the Wallis Iron Works as plaintiff, was to his use. The bill is filed by Mr. Kimball, who is a resident of this State, and Elias T. Day, of Jersey City, also a creditor of Lee (he has applied and come in under the attachment) suing for themselves and such other creditors as may apply under the attachment; and its object is to obtain an adjudication that the assignment from Lee to Rutan is, by reason of its giving preferences, invalid as against Lee's creditors residing here, and to get a decree that the receiver pay over the money to the auditor in the attachment. On the filing of the bill an order to show cause why the receiver should not be restrained from paying over the money was granted, with an ad interim stay.

The assignment to Rutan was made December 18, six months after the appointment of the receiver. The order of the New York Court authorizing the assignee to make the settlement was made September 12, 1885, and the settlement was made very soon thereafter. The attachment was not issued until October 27, 1885, about a month after the receiver had made the settlement with the assignee. The assignee had, under his assignment, a good title to the property thereby assigned; but that title was (as to assets in States whose policy it was not to recognize, as against the claims of creditors of the assignor domiciled there, the validity of general assignments for the benefit of creditors with preferences) liable to be defeated by attachments sued out of the courts of those States by creditors domiciled therein to recover their debts out of such assets.

The receiver made the settlement with the assignee, without any manner of opposition or objection on the part of the creditors of Lee domiciled here. And that settlement was made in conjunction with other creditors of the construction company and as part of a plan into which they and other persons interested in the railroad and construction companies entered for their mutual benefit, and by which the means were raised by the receiver to pay the amount which the creditors agreed with each other and with him that they would accept in satisfaction of their claims.

Not only did the attaching creditor delay issuing the attachment until after the agreement of settlement had been made by the assignee under the sanction of a court (which sanction was specially obtained on notice to the creditors of Lee), but the attachment was not issued until after the receiver had notified the assignee that he would pay him the amount agreed upon between them and had so bound himself to pay it to the assignee.

The agreement between the receiver and the assignee must be regarded in equity as a novation of the debt. It was an agreement that, in consideration of the assignee's consent to accept the compromise, the receiver would pay him the amount agreed upon. Thenceforward the obligation was substantially a new one between the receiver and the assignee, the consideration of it being the compromise of the old debt, the title to which was, at the time of the compromise, in the assignee.

No claim of the complainants, based upon the policy of our law, can be of any avail against it now. They have waited too long. They have waited until the receiver has become liable, by special agreement, to pay the assignee. Before that time the liability was different. It was an obligation to pay the claim or the dividends thereon to the person or persons entitled thereto, and the title of the assignee might have been questioned. But now the obligation has been changed, by fair and wholly legiti-mate means, into an obligation on the part of the receiver to pay the assignee. The complainants are barred by their laches; and the receiver is, under the circumstances, entitled to the protection of the court against the garnishment.

The order to show cause will be discharged, with costs.

1. An administrator has no power to increase the amount due upon a mortgage on the real estate of his intestate.
2. The question whether an administrator has received and used money for the advantage of the heir in discharging liabilities against the inherited estate, so as to charge the heir therewith, is to be raised and determined in the orphans' court, not in a suit in chancery.
3. Where more interest than was actually called for has been paid on a mortgage, the tender of such a sum as, together with the excess of interest paid, will equal the amount due on the mortgage, is a good tender in satisfaction of the mortgage.

BILL to foreclose a mortgage.

The questions raised are stated in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Peter L. Voorhees, for complainant.
Mr. John W. Wartman, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

This bill is to foreclose a mortgage. The only question is as to the amount due. The complainant claims $700 of principal, while the defendant insists that there is only $600 due. The defendant made a tender of the $600 before suit. He tendered nothing more, and now insists that the complainant had claimed that $700 was the principal for a long time; and that he had paid interest on that sum in excess, for six years six months and eight days, so that the amount of the interest for that period on the $100 was more than the interest due on the $600 at the time of the tender. In other words, considering the amount thus paid in excess under a misapprehension, there were only $600 due when the tender was made. At or before the filing of the answer the same amount was paid into court.

The bond and mortgage were given by Budd D. Gale to W. W. Bogart, who afterwards assigned them to the complainant. Bogart's testimony makes it very plain that the mortgage was, at one time, actually reduced from $1,300 to $600. After it was so reduced the mortgagor died. His widow became the administratrix of his estate. After the mortgage was so reduced in value, Bogart says that he advanced money to the administratrix; and in settlement it was found that $100 were due to him, to secure which it was agreed that he should hold the said mortgage for $700 instead of for only $600. It appears that he received that amount when he assigned it.

The mother of the defendant was not only administratrix of the estate of the mortgagor, but was also guardian of her son, the defendant. The mother died in February, 1883. On August 4, 1884, the defendant became of age, soon after which he learned of the amount which had actually been paid on the bond.

As between this heir at law and the assignees of the mortgage, ought the claim for $700 to be enforced? I think not. I believe that the mortgagor may voluntarily increase the amount due upon a mortgage in the manner above presented, because the land he is burdening is his, but I cannot perceive any ground for such right on the part of his administratrix. The administratrix had no power to execute a mortgage on the real estate of the intestate. She did not own the land and, in that capacity, had no interest in the land. Indeed, except in case of debts which the personal estate would not pay, she could not reach the land for any purpose, and then only through an order of the orphans' court.

Nor can it be said that it will be equitable to allow this $100, at this time, because the estate of the intestate had the benefit of it. I say it would not be equitable, because there is no sufficient proof that the estate had the benefit of it. Besides, the pleadings are not framed to raise such an issue. And if that were possible, under the circumstances of this case, I think the court should wait long before entertaining the question at all. How can this heir at law meet such an issue in this court? How can he be called upon to answer whether or not that $100 was used by the administratrix to his advantage in discharging the liabilities against his father's estate?

The orphans' court was the tribunal to raise and to determine that question, and the person to present it was the administratrix herself upon the filing of the account.

As to the proof, what is it? Most uncertain. There is the oath of the mortgagee that he advanced the money, and there the proof ends. Whether it was used for the estate or not in no sense appears. Therefore, to decree that this money was devoted to the interests of the estate would be making a decree without any proof for it to rest upon. Everyone would pronounce such course highly inequitable.

Was the tender good in law? As I understand the evidence, the interest had been paid on $700 until May 1, 1884, and it had been paid at this rate for six years and six months after the mortgage had been reduced to $600.

Finding as I have above, the interest paid in excess must be credited upon the principal. The interest so paid amounted to at least $45.50, which would make the principal due May 1, 1884, $549.50.

On October 4, following, the tender of the $600 was made, at which time there was less than $19 interest due, making the whole amount due less than $588.50. Therefore, as the tender was made without demanding any change or without any other condition whatever, and as the only ground of refusing to accept it was that it was not enough, the law pronounces the tender good.

The complainant is entitled to the $600 without costs, and the defendant is entitled to his costs.

I will so advise.

v.

Cord MAHNKEN et al.

1. Evidence on the question whether a mortgage, given to secure a usurious premium in addition to the debt, had been paid off, or whether the indebtedness secured thereby was included in a later mortgage, examined. Held, that the first mortgage had been fully paid before the second was executed and that recovery of the usurious premium paid was barred by limitation.
2. A draft drawn upon a fund not then in existence, and the value of which depended upon the result of a pending law suit, held, upon the evidence, to have been given as additional security for an existing indebtedness, and not in payment thereof.

BILL for relief. Dismissed.

On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. The evidence examined is set forth in the opinion.

Mr. J. Alward, for complainant.

Mr. A. C. Hartshorne, for defendant Mahnken.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The object of this suit is to bring the defendants (who, from April, 1871, to April, 1882, were partners in the wholesale grocery business in the City of New York, under the firm name of Mahnken & Moorhouse) to an account with the complainant, who during that period was their customer and bought goods of them to sell at retail in his store in Elizabeth, in this State, in respect to certain business transactions which took place between them during the before mentioned period.

The bill alleges that about the 16th of August, 1872, the complainant borrowed $2,000 of the defendants on a usurious contract between him and them for the payment by him to them of a premium of $500 for the loan; that the payment of the $2,500 with interest at 7 per centum per annum was to be secured by his bond and mortgage on real property of his in the City of Elizabeth; that the loan, which was of $2,000 only, was made, and the bond and mortgage for $2,500 were given accordingly; that in January, 1875, the complainant had paid up the interest on the bond and mortgage and $500 of the principal; that then a new bond and mortgage of the same property for $2,000 were given instead of the bond and mortgage for $2,500, and the last mentioned mortgage was canceled of record; that the complainant afterwards, in August, 1878, on account of and in further dealings between him and the defendants, gave them another mortgage (for $1,500 and interest) upon the same property, and other land also in the City of Elizabeth; that after the giving of the last mentioned bond and mortgage the complainant continued to deal with the defendants; that on or about the 30th day of March, 1881, he had paid up all the interest on the two mortgages of $2,000 and $1,500 respectively; that he was then desirous of paying his entire indebtedness to the defendants and of redeeming his lands from the lien of those mortgages; that he was then the owner of an order given by one William H. Adams upon his attorney, Allen C. Clark, of Washington, D. C., calling for the sum of $5,500, which order was accepted by Clark, and was considered good; that the complainant, wishing to dispose of that order and realize the amount due thereon, offered it to the defendants; and they made due inquiry about it and agreed with him that they would take it in payment of the mortgages and his further and other indebtedness to them, if any existed, and pay him the difference between the amount of the order and the amount which should be found due upon a proper statement of the account between him and them; and that as part payment of that difference they paid him, on the 30th of March, 1881, $450, and promised to give him credit for the order on their books, and state the account, and account to him for the balance of that difference, and deliver up to him the bonds and mortgages receipted and canceled, and execute to him discharges of the mortgages.

The defendants dissolved their copartnership in April, 1882. Mahnken bought out Moorhouse's interest in the firm's property and assumed the payment of the debts. Mahnken has answered. Moorhouse has not. The former, in his answer, states that the $2,500 mortgage was paid off before the $2,000 one was given, and denies that the order was given in payment of the complainant's indebtedness, but alleges that it was given as additional security therefor.

The only questions discussed upon the hearing were whether the $2,500 bond and mortgage were usurious, and whether the order was taken in payment of the complainant's indebtedness to the firm or merely as collateral security therefor.

That the loan of $2,000 was made upon an agreement that in consideration thereof the complainant should pay to the defendant a premium of $500 is established by the proof. It is urged, however, on the part of Mahnken, that that mortgage was paid off in full before the $2,000 mortgage was given, and that the latter was given, not for part of the money secured by the $2,500 mortgage but for an entirely different indebtedness. This claim is established by the evidence. The $2,500 mortgage was paid off by payments made directly thereon before the $2,000 mortgage was given.

The last payment (which was of $150.13) was made January 9, 1875. The $2,000 mortgage was given January 15, 1875. When it was given, there were $2,548.58 due from the complainant to the defendants on book account. No part of the money secured by the $2,500 mortgage was in any way included in the $2,000 mortgage. As just stated, the last payment on account of the $2,500 mortgage was made January 9, 1875. The bill was not filed until October 8, 1882, nearly eight years after that payment. Recovery of the premium paid upon the loan of $2,000 secured by that mortgage is barred by limitation. Moorhouse has lived in this State ever since the mortgage was given. Bruce v. Flagg, 1 Dutch. 219.

Nor is the claim that the order was given and accepted in payment of all indebtedness of the complainant to the defendants established. When that order was given (it is dated March 19, 1881) the complainant owed the defendants a large sum of money (about $5,340) upon the two mortgages of $2,000, and $1,500 respectively, and upon a note of $964.14, payable on demand, given to them by him April 27, 1880, on settlement for a balance of account due them March 1, 1880, and $502.57 for a balance of account due them from him when the order was given.

At the time when the note for $964.14 was given, the complainant's credit with the firm of Mahnken & Moorhouse was not good. As conditions of further credit it was then agreed between him and them that the balance of his indebtedness thereafter to be incurred should not exceed $300, that he should pay all bills promptly within thirty days after they had been contracted, and should pay $50 a month upon that note. From about the first of November, 1880, until the time when the order was given, he was unable to purchase any goods from them on credit, but was required to pay on delivery. From the time when the order was given, to the dissolution of the firm, he again had credit: and at the latter date he owed them on account, for goods sold and cash advanced from August 18, 1880, to August 16, 1881, a balance of $1,121.11.

According to the weight of the evidence, the order was given as additional security for his indebtedness to the firm. It was drawn by William H. Adams upon Allen C. Clark, his attorney, and accepted by the latter. It directed the drawee, after deducting his fees and incidental expenses in the prosecution of the drawer's claims against the District of Columbia before the United States Court of Claims, and also $1,100, the amount of a previous acceptance then outstanding, to pay to the order of Mahnken & Moorhouse $5,500 out of any money that might be awarded to the drawer by the court of claims in his suits then pending against the District of Columbia in that court.

The claim mentioned in the order was for work done in Washington by William H. Adams (the complainant's brother), as contractor for certain municipal works there; and although the contract was made and the work done by him, they were made and done on behalf of the complainant also, who was a silent partner with him therein. The $5,500 were due to the complainant for profits and money advanced for the works; and part of the $2,000 borrowed of the defendants, which had gone into the works, was embraced in the $5,500. It will be seen that the draft was upon no existing fund. Whether it would have any value or not depended entirely upon the result of a law suit.

The complainant and Mr. Moorhouse, indeed, both swear that the agreement between them (Mr. Mahnken appears to have been personally no party to it) was that the order was to be taken absolutely as satisfaction for the complainant's then indebtedness; and they also say that he was to receive from the firm the difference between the amount mentioned therein, $5,500, and the amount of that indebtedness. That indebtedness at the date of the order was over $5,340. They state that $450 were paid to him at about that date on account of that difference. The two sums of $5,340 and $450 together make an amount greater by nearly $300 than the amount mentioned in the order.

It seems very improbable that the firm would have agreed not only to accept such an order in satisfaction of his indebtedness to them and give up the mortgage security which they held, but, in addition, to advance him $450 on account of a merely supposed difference between the amount of his indebtedness and the amount mentioned in the order.

On the one hand, the complainant, who is an interested witness, and Mr. Moorhouse, who, although he is disinterested, would seem to be unfriendly to Mahnken, testify to the existence of the agreement as alleged in the bill. On the other, there is the evidence of the defendant Mahnken, who is interested, and of Mr. Jansen, the book-keeper of the firm, who is entirely disinterested, and of Edward A. Mahnken, son of the defendant Mahnken.

Mr. Jansen testifies that before the order was given, Mr. Moorhouse, in his presence, pressed the complainant for payment, saying that they were not sufficiently secured by the mortgages and note, and that he wanted to be better secured; and the complainant then proposed to give the order as additional security, and Mr. Moorhouse accepted it as such. He also testifies that Moorhouse told him that he had received the order as additional security, and that the complainant was to have credit again on account of it. The order was never credited on the books of the firm, and the complainant was well aware of that fact but never complained of it. He also knew that he was charged on the books with the $450 advanced to him at the time when the order was given. He received numerous statements of account after the order was given, from which, as well as from his examination of the books, he was apprised of the fact that he was not credited with the order. He attempts to avoid the force of this fact by saying that he very seldom looked over the statements that he received because, although his home was in Elizabeth, he was in business in Washington, and adds that he was "back and forth." His business in Washington, he says, was the business of contracting for making sewers, laying pavements, etc. He admits that from 1875 to the time of the commencement of this suit (October, 1882), he was in Washington but once.

Edward A. Mahnken, who was a clerk of the firm, testifies that Moorhouse, when he, Mahnken, asked him whether certain goods which he was about to send to the complainant, and which the latter had bought of the firm, should be so marked as that they should not be delivered without payment of the bill therefor, as had previously, from October, 1880, been the method adopted by the firm in their dealings with the complainant, answered: "No, it is all right now; I have got more security; I have got an order on Washington."

Mr. Mahnken, defendant, testifies that Moorhouse told him that the order was taken as collateral security for the payment by the complainant of his indebtedness to the firm. And here it will not be out of place to say that although Moorhouse swears that the order was left at the store of the firm during his absence at home by reason of illness, the complainant testifies that he gave it to Moorhouse himself at the store, and he thinks Mr. Mahnken was not present but the book keeper was.

The defendant Mahnken also testifies that after the dissolution he called on the complainant for payment of his indebtedness to the late firm and offered to deduct 15 or 20 per cent from the amount, if the complainant would pay it; and that the latter said he would pay if he had the money. He says they referred to the Washington claim, and complainant said that he had got nothing from it and doubted very much whether he ever would get anything; that as soon as he got that money he would settle up, but that there was no depending upon it. He also swears that Moorhouse told him that he had to give the complainant some cash, but did not say how much, to get the order.

When the firm dissolved, a written agreement of dissolution was signed by Mahnken and Moorhouse. By it all the assets were assigned to the former, and bonds and mortgages are specially mentioned, the words "stocks, bonds and mortgages" having been interlined before it was signed, and therefore the attention of Moorhouse was drawn to it. He thus recognized the bonds and mortgages given by the complainant as valid existing evidences of debt, for the firm does not appear to have any other bonds and mortgages. He sold out all his interest in the assets, including them, to Mahnken for $40,000, the latter to pay the debts.

There are other weighty reasons against accepting the complainant's version of the transaction under consideration. Not only were the bonds and mortgages and notes not surrendered, and the account receipted when the order was given, but there was no written evidence given of any undertaking by or on the part of the defendants to accept the order in discharge of all claims against the complainant, or to surrender the bonds and mortgages, and note and receipt his account. He left the bonds and mortgages and note in the hands of the defendants after giving the order. He says, indeed, that he demanded them from Moorhouse and was put off from time to time, but he not only took no steps to obtain them but never complained that they were not delivered to him. He never demanded them from Mahnken. When the relations of the parties to each other and the character of the order before adverted to and the conduct of the parties are considered, it seems quite clear that the order was not accepted as satisfaction but merely as additional security and that in order to get it as security Moorhouse advanced to the complainant, for the firm, $450.

On the hearing, a motion was made on the part of the defendant Mahnken for leave to introduce evidence that the suit mentioned in the order has been decided adversely to the plaintiff therein, and so the order has proved to be utterly worthless. The decision upon that application was reserved until this time. The evidence would be irrelevant and immaterial. The motion, therefore, is denied.

The bill will be dismissed, with costs.

v.

Christina TREFZ et al.

If a bonus for the loan of money, which if paid to the lender directly would render the loan usurious, is paid to the agent of the lender without the knowledge and against the will of the lender, he is not affected by the illegality of the transaction and may enforce a mortgage given him to secure such loan; but if the bonus is taken by the agent with the knowledge of the lender, then his mortgage must be declared usurious.*

BILL to foreclose a mortgage. Defense sustained.

On final hearing on bill and answer and proofs taken in open court.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, for complainant.

Mr. Joseph Coult, for defendants.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit to foreclose a mortgage bearing date November 16, 1874, made by the defendants' testator to the complainant's testator, to secure $20,000. The mortgage was payable in one year from its date, and bore interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

The defense is usury. It is undisputed that in the negotiation of the loan secured by the mortgage the mortgagee's son acted as the agent of his father and, on the conclusion of the transaction, received from the mortgagor the sum of $5,000 in addition to $50 which the mortgagor paid him for making searches and drawing papers connected with the loan. The mortgagor paid interest on the $20,000 at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; so that it will be seen that the sum which he actually received, $15,000, cost him (for the period for which by the terms of the papers the loan was to run) the enormous sum of 43 per cent.

It is manifest that no honest business can be conducted successfully which purchases the use of money at such a price. This fact of itself makes it the plain duty of the court, as it seems to me, to examine this transaction with the most jealous scrutiny, and to denounce it as highly illegal, unless it satisfactorily appears that the mortgagee was in no way responsible for this extraordinary exaction. The design of the statutes against usury has been said to be to prevent avarice from preying upon necessity; but if this transaction must stand, and the device resorted to in this case to defeat the purpose of the law must be held to be beyond the reach of judicial correction, it is certain that our law has not accomplished its purpose and that the evil it was intended to correct still exists in full vigor.

The following statement presents all the material facts attending the making and execution of the contract of loan:

The mortgagor, through his book keeper, applied to the mortgagee for a loan of $20,000, to be secured by mortgage; the mortgagee said he could make the loan, but in order to do so he would have to sell some of his securities, which he could only do at a great loss; to this the mortgagor's agent replied that if he would raise the money and make the loan the mortgagee would stand the loss. The mortgagee then said that his son was his agent, and that mortgagor's agent had better go and talk with him. The mortgagor and his book keeper thereupon went to see the son and told him the object of their visit. The son said that he would see his father and talk with him about the loan. They subsequently saw the son again, when he told them that his father had the money, but that he (the son) had received an offer from other parties, of $5,000 as commissions for procuring a loan of $20,000; that he could get that from other parties, but if they were willing to pay the same sum they could have the money. At this time the mortgagor declined to take the loan on the terms proposed. Subsequently his necessities became so pressing that he was compelled to submit; and he accordingly sent his book keeper to the son to notify him that he would take the money on the terms offered. The son furnished the money for the whole loan. He owed his father, for collections previously made, between $2,000 and $3,000. This he paid, and the father raised the balance by selling United States bonds to his son. The son says: "I had money on hand which I wanted to invest, and so I concluded to take father's bonds at their market value."

The whole $20,000 was drawn from bank by the son and delivered to his father and then passed back. Five thousand dollars was drawn on November 17, 1874. The whole of this sum was delivered to the mortgagor on the same day, and the bond and mortgage were at the same time delivered to the mortgagee. The mortgagor was required on the same day to sign a receipt under seal, acknowledging the receipt of the $5,000. The remaining $15,000 was drawn on November 20, 1874. The son, on the same day, delivered the money to his father; who at once laid it on a table in his son's office, at which his son, the mortgagor and the mortgagor's book keeper were sitting. The mortgagor was then required to sign another receipt under seal, admitting the receipt of the $15,000, and stating that that sum, together with the $5,000 previously received, made up the amount of the mortgage. This paper on being signed was given to the mortgagee, who immediately left the room where the parties were, and the door between that room and the one into which the mortgagee went was closed. The $15,000 was then counted and $5,000 of it was handed over by the mortgagor to the son. The son says that his father got no part of this money and did not know that he received it; that his father knew that he was in the habit of getting commissions for procuring loans, but he did not know what they were. The son further says that he told the mortgagor during the negotiation that if the loan was made, his fee would be $5,000; and that he stated as the grounds of his charge that the loan was a large one; that the security offered was not the first lien, and that he could get a fee of that amount from other parties. The property pledged for the payment of the loan was, in the judgment of the son, sufficient to render the money entirely safe. The person who got the $5,000 was the only child of his father and is the person now before the court asking that a decree be made that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed is a valid lien for $20,000.

A charge of usury, whether made as the ground of affirmative relief or as a defense, always presents a question of fact which, like other questions of fact, must be decided by the evidence. Under the statute in force at the time the contract under consideration was made, usury consisted in taking a higher rate of interest than that allowed by law; the prohibition of the statute being that no person should take, upon any contract, directly or indirectly, more than $7 for the forbearance of $100 for one year. Rev. p. 519.

The test question therefore, in this case is: Is it proved that the lender took, directly or indirectly, on this loan, a higher rate of interest than that allowed by law? That a sum was taken so far above that allowed by law as to make the bargain an exceptionally oppressive one to the borrower is a fact beyond dispute. But it is said that the $5,000 was not taken as interest or bonus, but was paid as compensation to the lender's agent for services in inducing the lender to make the loan.

This, in my judgment, is a plain abuse of language. When money is given as compensation for services, the sum paid must, in order to be fairly entitled to be called compensation, bear some relation to the value of the services rendered. In such an affair as this it was not possible for any person, no matter how great his skill or valuable his time, to earn, by any service which it was possible for him to render to the borrower, a sum at all approaching in amount that which was paid. It is true that where, as in this case, the principal is the agent's father, it is always within the agent's power to say to the borrower: "My principal has the money you want but he will not let you have it unless I advise him to do so; and I will not so advise him unless you will give me, as a fee, the one fourth of the sum you desire to borrow."

If the borrower yields to such a demand, he does not make compensation for services but gives a douceur. In such a transaction the principal is entitled to the very best skill and judgment his agent can give; and he also has a right that his agent shall keep himself entirely free from the least temptation to betray him. If in such a transaction an agent clandestinely stipulates for the payment of a fee to himself as a condition of advising the loan, his bargain, in my judgment, is a corrupt one; and if he takes the fee he receives a bribe. No man can, at the same time, serve two masters having different or conflicting interests.

The evidence shows that this loan was under negotiation between two and three weeks. Suppose we say that the negotiations covered the longest period, three weeks, and that the mortgagee's son devoted the whole of each day, Sundays included, to argumentation to convince his father that he ought to make the loan, the whole period of his service would then have been twenty-one days, and his compensation at the rate of over $230 a day. In a case where a charge, much less exorbitant in amount, was made by a lender under the guise of compensation for professional services, the court of errors and appeals, speaking by Mr. Justice Dixon, declared that the assertion that the money was received as compensation for services was incredible; but that it was quite manifest, on the contrary, that it was received as a usurious bonus. And so the court adjudged the fact to be, in spite of the lender's positive affirmation, under oath, to the contrary. Boyd v. Engelbrecht, 9 Stew. 612.

It is manifestly idle to call the $5,000 compensation for services. It was not paid as compensation for services, but for the loan. It was paid for the money. A payment for such a purpose contravenes the very foundation principle of the law against usury.

But it is said that the illegal payment was not made to the mortgagee. It is not necessary that it should have been, to infect the contract with usury. There can be no doubt that if the mortgagee had made this contract in person, and it had been agreed that the mortgagor should, as a condition of the loan, pay to the mortgagee's son a fee of $5,000, the presence of that stipulation would have rendered the contract usurious. If the thing forbidden by law is done, the law is violated; and it is wholly unimportant by what particular method the violation is effected or who gets the fruit of its violation. The thing the statute prohibits is the taking of more than a fixed rate of interest for the use of money. The design of the statute is the protection of borrowers. Now, it is manifest that the law is just as effectually violated and the harm to the borrower is just as great when the spoil goes to the pocket of a stranger as when it goes to the pocket of the lender.

The important question in cases of this kind is: Was the bonus or illegal interest taken, no matter by whom, pursuant to the terms of the contract of loan with the knowledge of the lender? If it was the contract is usurious. That it was in this case would seem to be almost incontestable. It is undisputed here that the borrower first applied to the lender; that the lender said that he could make the loan but to do so he would be compelled to sell his securities at a loss, and that the borrower replied that he would stand the loss. At this point the lender sent the borrower to his son to arrange the terms of the contract. The son and the borrower did arrange them, and one of them was that the borrower should pay the lender's son $5,000 for advising his father to make the loan.

In view of these facts, I think it is impossible to say that the lender did not send the borrower to his son to have just such a contract entered into as the son afterwards made. It will be remembered that the work of negotiation was almost complete; the minds of the parties had met on all the material parts of the contract; the lender had the money which the borrower wanted, or could readily raise it; he was willing to make the loan, but he wanted something in addition to legal interest; the borrower was willing to pay more than legal interest; the lender's son was a lawyer, the lender was not; and now, when they reach the point where it is necessary that a plan should be devised for the payment of more than legal interest for the money, the lender sends the borrower to his son. To my mind it is clear that his object in doing so was to have the difficult part of the contract arranged.

Besides, it will be remembered that two of the reasons which the son urged in justification of this extraordinary charge had special reference to his father. They were just such reasons as a greedy lender, dealing in person, would present to the mind of an eager borrower. The son says that he told the borrower that the loan was a large one and that the security offered was not a first lien. These considerations were such, it will be observed, as concerned the lender principally, if not exclusively. If the loan was made, the lender had to raise the money; the labor and loss of doing so were his; and if the security to be taken for the loan was insufficient or subject to any infirmity or disadvantage, the risk was the lender's. Mere form of speech, in such a matter, is wholly immaterial. The son may, in this transaction, appear, if we look merely at the form of his speech, to have been speaking for himself; but if we look at the substance of what he said we must see that what he said was said for his father and not for himself.

That the contract actually made in this case required the borrower to pay more than legal interest is free from all doubt. But suppose we say that the contract in this respect was unauthorized, and that the lender never meant or consented that his agent should place himself in a position where he would be under a very powerful temptation to betray him; then the lender was bound (according to one of the best established and most salutary principles of the law of agency) as soon as the fact, that his agent had transcended his authority and committed a fraud against him, came to his knowledge, to repudiate the contract and disavow it in toto. The moment a principal obtains knowledge that his agent has, in pretending to deal for him, exceeded his authority, the law calls upon him to act. He cannot toy with the situation; he must either own or disown his agent's act, and he must do so in toto; he cannot ratify part and repudiate the rest. In the language of Judge Story: "He must adopt the whole or none. A ratification of part, with full knowledge of all the material circumstances, operates as a confirmation of the whole." Story, Agency, § 250.

Now, while this is a well established rule of almost universal application, I am obliged to add that it seems to be authoritatively decided that contracts of the class under consideration do not fall within its operation, but that a lender may (where his agent has, without his knowledge and against his will, stipulated for the payment of a bonus to himself as a condition of the loan, and where it satisfactorily appears that the lender was free from the least intention to violate or evade the law against usury) enforce that part of the contract which he intended should be made and repudiate the rest. The leading case on this subject is Condit v. Baldwin, 21 Barb. 181; S. C. 21 N. Y. 219.

The doctrine established by this case has been followed in New York in North v. Sergeant, 33 Barb. 850; Fellows v. Comrs. of Oneida, 36 Barb. 655; Bell v. Day, 32 N. Y. 165; and by the Court of Errors and Appeals of this State in Muir v. Newark Soc. Inst. 1 C. E. Green, 537.

This doctrine was not adopted by the Court of Appeals of New York without a struggle; and since its adoption it seems to have been conceded that its soundness could not be defended; but it was adhered to in Bell v. Day, simply on the ground that it was better that the law on such a subject should be considered settled than that it should be settled exactly in conformity to correct principles. In the case last mentioned, a majority of the judges who heard it were convinced that the doctrine was unsound, but two of them, Chief Judge Denio and Judge John K. Porter, nevertheless, voted to adhere to it on the ground of stare decisis, and it was thus maintained. But the law, so far as this court is concerned, must be considered settled.

The rule, then, to be applied in the solution of the case, under the view last stated, is this: If the $5,000 was taken without the knowledge and against the will of the lender, he, notwithstanding the fact that the contract of loan was in fact usurious, is not affected by its illegality, and may enforce his mortgage; but if, on the contrary, the $5,000 was taken with his knowledge, then he was a participant in the illegal exaction and should be required to bear its penal consequences.

The proofs leave little room for doubt that the lender knew, before he advanced the money, that a bonus was to be paid for the loan. The son says that his father knew that he was in the habit of charging fees or commissions for procuring loans, but his father did not know how much he received in this case. He does not, however, say that he did not tell his father how much he was to receive.

When the lender and borrower suspended their negotiations and the lender sent the borrower to his son, it will be remembered that the only part of the contract which was incomplete was that which should provide a method by which the lender should be reimbursed for the loss he would sustain on the sale of his securities. The son made that part of the contract. Did not the father want to know what it was? Would he ever have consented to make the loan until he knew? Or suppose we say that the father's intention, when he sent the borrower to his son, was that his son should negotiate the whole contract, arrange all its parts; still it would be necessary for him, in order to raise the money, to sell his securities and thus incur a loss, and he would, therefore, still be in a position where he would be naturally anxious to know how he was to be reimbursed, and unwilling to furnish the money until he had satisfactory information on that subject. There can be no doubt that he knew. His own conduct furnishes a very strong evidence on this point.

There is no dispute in the evidence that immediately after the father laid the last $15,000 of the loan on his son's table, he left the room where the business was being transacted and went into the adjoining room, and that the door between the two rooms was closed. The mortgagor's bookkeeper says that the father remained in the adjoining room until the business was completed, and that he found him there when he went out; while the son says that he did not see his father again after he left the room until near the close of the day. There is no dispute, however, that he left. Now, why did he leave? His son, it is true, was there to represent him and to do for him whatever was necessary to be done; but an important contract involving $20,000, to which he was a party, was in course of execution and at its most interesting point; at the point where the money was to be handed over and the securities delivered and the final words spoken; he had no business or duty which called him elsewhere; he had a right to be in the room where the business was being transacted; his interest, as well as his curiosity, would naturally make him desire to be there; but he went away, and as soon as he was placed in a position where he could neither see nor hear what was done, one fourth of the sum secured by the mortgage he had just taken was paid to his son, as a fee for advising him to make the loan. Can there be a doubt in the mind of any person at all familiar with the motives which control human conduct why he went away? I have none.

The proofs convince me that the contract, on which the mortgage sought to be foreclosed is founded, was usurious; and therefore the defense must prevail.

SUPREME COURT.

ATLANTIC CITY WATER WORKS CO. v. ATLANTIC CITY.

1. Under the provision of the charter of Atlantic City authorizing the City to provide by ordinance "for a supply of water for said City," the City is empowered to contract to pay a specified sum annually for a series of years for the use of water for fire purposes.
2. The power of the City to contract for a water supply is not limited to contracts for one year only, by a subsequent provision of the charter empowering the City to raise by tax "from year to year" money to defray the expense of supplying the City with water.
3. A contract made by a city, under an ordinance which has not been annulled and which is not ultra vires, is obligatory at law.
4. It does not necessarily follow that, because a contract entered into by a city calls for payments in futuro indefinitely, such obligation was in excess of the limits of expenditure imposed upon the common council.

ACTION of covenant. Judgment for plaintiff.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. H. Grey, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Slape & Stephany, for defendant.

Beasley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of covenant founded upon articles of agreement entered into by the plaintiff and defendant, whereby the plaintiff covenanted to supply Atlantic City with water, in consideration of certain privileges granted by the municipality, and its stipulation to pay a specified sum annually for the use of the water in the extinguishment of fires. The contract was to continue as long as the Company should comply with its obligations.

The declaration sets out this agreement in full, and assigned as a breach the nonpayment of sundry sums of money alleged to be due for water supplied to a number of fire hydrants which had been erected for the use of the City. A demurrer to this declaration was put in.

The incapacity of Atlantic City to enter into the contract stated in the declaration was the principal objection pressed upon the argument on the part of the defendant. It was insisted that so far as it related to Atlantic City the agreement forming the basis of the suit was an act ultra vires. But this contention, manifestly, is not sustainable. The charter of the City, granted in the year 1866, declares in express terms that the common council of the City shall have authority to provide by ordinance "for a supply of water for said City;" and in the present instance an ordinance was duly passed and the contract in dispute entered into in pursuance of its provisions.
